A nosotros, los Latinos de Estados Unidos (EE.UU) nos importa la historia de las Americas. Somos un pueblo en plena lucha por nuestros derechos. Somos un pueblo en ascenso gracias a nuestros propios esfuerzos y nos urge saber de donde venimos y quienes somos.

En los EE.UU hay una gran necesidad en definir quienes somos; que color es el latino, quien es más latino — el nacido aca o quien viene de alla. A pesar de que somos latinos no todos hablamos español; tampoco somos del mismo pais. Hay temas de más importancia que nos deberian preocupar, por ejemplo, nuestro lugar politico y econômico en este pais.

Para quienes quieren saber quién somos como latinos debemos reconocer que ser latino en los EE.UU es diferente que ser latinoamericano en nuestra propia tierra. Pero eso no quiere decir que somos menos latinos. Colocamos barreras entre nosotros porque un latino es un poco más oscuro que nosotros. ¿Hemos olvidado como se formó nuestra cultura?

Un recuerdo de quienes somos: somos hijos de un encuentro entre las culturas. También creo que el termino descubrimiento sigue siendo valido: el asombro que occurrio entre ambas partes cuando se vieron ojo a ojo por primera ves los Hombres del Hierro y los Hombres del Maiz.

Somos hijos de la subyugacion de las culturas y la terrible herencia que fue la esclavitud. Somos hijos de la fusión de culturas, lo que los entusiosos llaman el sincretismo. Somos una mezcla de diferente culturas. Somos hijos de un encuentro difícil.

Hay que saber a respetar la tierra, las costumbres, las leyes, las tradiciones y el color. En nuetra época este impulso liberador se extiende al cambio de la igualdad entre los sexos, la protección del medio ambiente y la de los derechos humanos. Seguimos la lucha contra la desigualdad racial.

La historia de las Américas no terminó con un blanco atropellando un indio y esclavizando a un negro. La historia americana reflejó la caida de un imperio, el español, y la ascendencia de otro, el inglés. Este desequilibrio hemisférico es el factor determinante en nuestra realidad como latinos en los EE.UU y pienso que nuestra raza tiene que estar en unión una raza humana.

Editor's Note: The following is a translation of the Spanish editorial.

To us, the Latinos of the United States, the history of the Americas is important. We are a people in plain fight for our rights. We are an ascending people thanks to our own efforts and it behooves us to know where we came from and who we are.

In the U.S. there is a big necessity to define who we are; what color is the Latino, who is more Latino — the person born here or the person who comes from over there.

Although we are all Latinos not all of us speak Spanish, nor do we all come from the same country. There are topics of greater importance that should concern us, for example, our political and economic status in this country.

To those who want to know who we are as Latinos we need to acknowledge that being Latinos in the U.S. is different than being latinoamericano in our own land but that does not make us less of Latinos. We place barriers with each other because one Latino is a shade darker than us. Did we forget how our culture came to be?

Just a reminder of who we are; we are children of an encounter between cultures. I think the term discovery is still valid: the amazement that occurred by both parties when the Man of Iron and the Man of Corn saw each other for the first time.

We are children of the subjugation of cultures and the horrible inheritance that was slavery. We are children of the fusion of cultures, what scholars call syncretism. We are children of a difficult encounter.

One has to know how to respect the Earth, customs, laws, traditions and racial colors. In our time this liberating impulse extends to the change in equality between the sexes the protection of the environment and human rights. We continue the fight against racial inequality.

The history of the Americas did not end with a white man trampling over an Indian and enslaving a black man. American history reflects the fall of one empire, the Spanish, and the ascendancy of another, the English. This hemispheric disequilibrium is the determining factor in our reality as Latinos in the U.S. and I think that our race has to be in unity a human race.

Roundtable discusses blacks, Latinos

By Nora Quintanilla
Collegian Correspondent

The Latin American Cultural Center (LACC) held a roundtable discussion last Tuesday night in Hampden Gallery focusing on the issue "Black = Latino." That is, are blacks and Latinos one and the same, and if so, in what sense?

African heritage has greatly permeated Caribbean-Latin American culture. Thus, the question is often raised whether blacks and Latinos can be considered one group of people — a theory referred to as the African diaspora.

The word "diaspora," according to Webster's dictionary, means a homogenous people driven or sent in different directions.

A fusion of cultures mixed in different proportions is the make of the Latinos. According to Latin American Studies Associate director Gloria Bernabe-Ramos, "Latino American culture is complex."

"Self-exploration" is what this discussion is about, Black Student Union President Lakeisha Kennedy said. "We need to look at the way people view the world, our own beliefs and understand why it is that we believe what we do."

Acknowledged at the discussion was that "people will and do see others through a different lens" perhaps with further discussions and "self-exploration" as Kennedy stated. Stereotypes, labels, "colorism" and all those "isms" will be less destructive as we reach the millennium.

The conclusion of the discussion was that this is an issue of great importance and needs to be explored further.

"Tharp!" defies tradition

The athletic choreography of Twyla Tharp will be displayed in her new show Tharp!, tonight at FAC.

By Emily Trask
Collegian Staff

The latest project of the creative dance diva Twyla Tharp entitled "Tharp!" will be showcased tonight at the Fine Arts Center Concert Hall at 8 p.m.

Tharp's choreography has been called sexy, funny, majestic, graceful, intricate and athletic. This innovative new show was designed to support Tharp's most ambitious work to date: three new pieces of vastly different styles, created and honed on a corps of 14 dancers.

It has been that this show was developed as a more vibrant, eclectic alternative to the conventional company model. "Tharp!" claims to embody the future of American modern dance. Inspired by various genres of music, Tharp has attempted to pull together three dynamic and unique dance pieces that promises to delight and move the audience.

The opening piece of the evening will be "Roy's Joys" with music by Roy Eldridge. Eldridge's swinging trumpet playing propels nine dancers into a "happy mayhem, acrobatic partnering, and good-natured competition — jazz made visible."

The second piece of the evening will be incorporating hymns from the Shaker tradition, as well as choral compositions by William Billings and music from The Sacred Harp. The piece is called "Sweet Fields" and is said to be an exploration of American spirituality as

Lowe's genre–blurring greatness

By Bradley Skaught

DIG MY MOOD
Nick Lowe
Upstart

As a solo artist, Nick Lowe established himself in the late '70s as a smart alec pop genius who was more than willing to utilize everything from punk to disco in service of sparkling melodic songs and clever lyrics — an artistic philosophy that worked well in his production work for Elvis Costello, too. When his albums began turning gimmicky, Lowe rounded up some choice sidemen to staff The Cowboy Outfit and started making roustier albums full of country, rockabilly and r&b influences.

By the late eighties, though, things had begun to peter out. One last major label album, Party of One, showed some spirit, but failed to catch fire and Lowe seemed to just disappear. In 1994, however, he returned with a new album, The Impossible Bird, on the tiny Upstart label. It was an album that displayed not just a reinvigoration, but damn near a reinvention.– Instead of playing dress up, Lowe decided to strip away the masks and finally make a Nick Lowe album.

Like The Impossible Bird, the new Dig My Mood is a subdued, intimate album — an album whose production touches are light and wholly in service of the songs, perhaps even more than The Impossible Bird. By putting such an emphasis on his vocals, Lowe has created a surprising resonance and depth in his singing almost never displayed before.

This is particularly true in several darker, quieter songs where Lowe has brought a kind of hushed desperation to his delivery. The opening song, "Faithless Lover," is little more than a single repeated line, framed almost entirely by tremolo-ed guitars and a wash of organ that makes for a chilling more–than–meets–the–eye portrait of a scorned lover. Henry McCullough's "Failed Christian" gets similar treatment with Lowe calling up the kind of rumble and pathos perfected by his former father–in–law Johnny Cash. Lowe's ex–wife is country singer Carlene Carter.

Cash's spirit is prevalent throughout the album, whether it's the tick–tock country of "Man That I've Become" or the bittersweet "Must Be Getting Over You" which recalls Cash's "I Still Miss Someone." Lowe is more than willing to push stylistic barriers, however, and there are even a couple of songs which wouldn't have sounded out of place in Nat King Cole's repertoire (or, more appropriately, someone like Ivory Joe Hunter, whose "Cole Grey Light of Dawn" closes the album.) In fact, Dig My Mood is really an album in the spirit of country singers like Ray Price, Marty Robbins and similar '60s country singers — artists whose found in the American music of the 18th and 19th centuries.

In this piece, Tharp created a kaleidoscope of deceptively easy motion, geometrical layering of ceremony coupled with moments of pure, simple beauty creating the perfect marriage of music and dance.

The third and final piece of the evening, "66," provides the audience with a glimpse of a road stretching into the horizon, Route 66. In the 1940s, this was the main path to the great West, the land of opportunity and dreams. This piece is described as a travelogue of hilarious, sexy and energetic vignettes that takes the audience along for the ride.

Tharp seeks and finds the perfect balance between high art and grand entertainment, crossing the genre boundaries between the worlds of ballet and Broadway, television and the big screen. Since founding her first company in 1965, Tharp has had a profound impact on the progression of modern dance.

Tickets for "Tharp!" are $35, $30, $20. Tickets for children 17 and under are $10, and tickets for Five College students are $5. For tickets call (413) 545-2511 or 1-800-999-UMAS.

Back to basic hip hop with Jurassic 5

Adam Dlugacz

Before I even get into this hip hop 401 session, I've got two words for you: Jurassic Five. One more time, Jurassic Five, 'cause they're bringing back hip-hop essence. These are five cats from California who are 100 percent whipped, creamy-smooth butter. They rewind to the eighties with jazzy beats, and rhymes that don't promote violence or pimpin'. All I know is that they have an independently released CD out, and I'll try to bring you the four-one-one after spring break.

I had to work on Saturday (mix tapes aren't free you know), so I missed most of the BMCP conference, but I heard it was quite an event. Big ups to everyone who was involved with putting it on. I did happen to catch the Peter Gunz/Lord Tariq performance. I hate to complain about something that people worked really hard on, but I do have issues with paying ten dollars to see Lord Tariq and Peter Gunz perform two and a half songs. Alright, "Deja Vu" was off the hook, but I was hoping to see a little more. Could it be that Gunz and Tariq are one hit wonders? Did they drop one of the illest tracks of the year, only to be exiled into bargain bins and used CD racks? (To be continued after their album comes out).

Tony Touch #56 is out, and the king is back. While Tony Touch has always been running the mix tape game for quite some time, I had the suspicion that he was slacking of late. The Diaz Brothers was hot, but I was starting to feel like he was just relying on bomb tracks to carry his albums. Someone must have notified Mister Toca, because he's hitting harder than Lawrence Taylor on cocaine. "You Know My Steez?" by Gang Starr sets this off, and judging by how many mix tape appearances that song has made, I think I know what album we're all drooling over. The tape reaches blast off in the middle when you get "Diesal" by Wu Tang Clan. "Desperado" by the Firm featuring Cannibus and "K.I.M." by EPMD featuring Redman and Keith Murray. One of the illest tracks is "Armagedon" by Cru, I think that cat smoked something he shouldn't have. "Armagedon" is one of the scariest tracks to ever grace my ears.

The other tasty treat I picked up the Stretch and Bobbito show from Nov. 13, 1997. You should probably seek out any copy of "The Stretch Armstrong Show" you can find. For those of you who don't know, the show is a radio show on WKCR 89.1 FM, although you probably can't get it around here. However since the Gods occasionally smile upon the hip-hop community you can pick up copies of this show in most mix tape stores.

Getting back to the original programming, Stretch isn't even spinning on this tape, but "dat's okay." DJ Eclipse delivers the goods and shows that he is a name you should keep your ears peeled for. Eclipse brings you some underground, subterranean tracks that you probably aren't going to hear anywhere else. Busta Rhymes delivers a porno track that will make you call you're loved one in a half a second. This is also where I heard the truth, I mean, Jurassic Five. There's a lot of middle school (you know, late-eighties, early-nineties) jams on here to keep you smiling. I find this tape especially necessary to combat the fact that every morning I wake up to find the weather in Amherst resembling the skies of London. Put this tape on and return that strut to your step and that Kool-Aid smile to your face.

As usual both the Tony Touch Vol. 56 and The Stretch Armstrong Show can be purchased from the fine gentleman at the Grow Room in Amherst.

Peace.

albums were a marvelous jumble of jazz, country, R&B and blues styles. With a real sense of genre-blurring back in the general musical consciousness, it's nice to hear Lowe calling up the spirits of such a fruitful and exciting period in modern musical history.

A fair amount of credit, however, goes to his wonderfully sensitive and accomplished band. The playing throughout is understated and smart, especially in the lush keyboard work of Geraint Watkins, whose fluid piano and organ playing gives an almost gospel-like atmosphere to the otherwise sparse songs. In many ways the music recalls Lowe's old British pub band, Brinsley Schwartz — a band that called heavily upon the The Band's musical vocabulary for its warm, folky character. Steve Donnely's guitar work, in particular, recalls Robbie Robertson's seamless marriage of country twang and deep southern soul. Making good use of this are the album's strongest songs, "What Lack of Love Had Done" and the wistful "High on a Hilltop" — both of which combine a sweet Memphis groove with Lowe's country leanings — a match that recalls The Cowboy Outfit's best work, but with a lovelier resonance and honesty. As on The Impossible Bird, there's a real sense of Lowe's own voice coming through — the songs are more straightforward than his earlier pop work, both musically and lyrically, but they ring true with a beautiful simplicity that, again, recalls the naked maturity of Johnny Cash.

Not everything Lowe touches turns to gold, however. "You Inspire Me" is an unconvincing vocal jazz number with some tired lyrics, and "Lead Me Not" never turns into a song to make the forced delivery engaging. There are also a few songs that are just too short, as if Lowe was treading lightly as to not spoil the simplicity that characterizes most of the songs. They're charming mistakes, though — not bad enough to sink the ship, and certainly not bad enough to distract from the rest of the stellar performances.

Lowe has already solidified his reputation as one of pop's most imaginative and exciting voices, but he's also joined the ranks of artists like Bob Dylan and Neil Young who continue to make relevant, important work that reflects the maturity and experience of age — invigorating creativity instead of tired retreading. Dig My Mood is a warm, intimate, even sad album that works its way in quietly like a fond memory on a sleepy morning. Lovely and affecting. A

Women's hockey off to nationals

The Massachusetts women's hockey team will compete in the national finals over the weekend of March 21-24 in Lake Placid, N.Y.

UMass advanced to the finals with a tie against North Community College, at the Clarkson tournament two weekends ago. The top two teams from the tourney made the cut for the national finals. UMass lost in a shootout with North Community.

At the tournament UMass (11-3-1) tied Trinity, 2-2, beat Penn State, 8-2, and destroyed Syracuse, 21-0. Coach Just n Blackman said the high score against the Orangewomen was to ensure UMass would make the finals.

Eliza Garvey, Jeanine Dennoncourt, Jenny Nolan and Molly Sherman have been playing strong for Massachusetts. Erin Murphy anchored the final line of defense with her play in goal.

Skating club becoming a reality

Students interested in competing in figure skating at UMass are forming a club in hopes of gaining RSO status next fall. Already, however, skaters are competing successfully under the UMass name. Liberte Sheldon, Jamie Coutu, Layla Cady, Jacqui Francis and Leigh Gautreau and Aimee Wallis have all skated in the competitive arena this year.

Anyone interested in joining the figure skating club can contact Wallis at 546-3636. General interest meetings are held Tuesdays at 6 p.m. in the 22nd floor lounge in Washington Tower.

Freshman Jill Fisher registered a 9.900 on the floor, her fifth best of the year. Fisher currently ranks second in the nation on the mat. Save Tammy Marshall's perfect ten at the nationals in 1993, Fisher has the top five scores on the floor in UMass history, including a perfect score of her own against West Virginia and M.I.T.

Junior Betsy Colucci took the vault crown with a 9.725, followed by sophomore Mandy Mosby's 9.65 and Chemcinski.

Kuzara let everybody in on the fun, putting all healthy bodies into the rotation. Juniors Amy Caputo and Sara Kelly and sophomore Rene Franklin all saw late-season action.

This Saturday, UMass travels to Ann Arbor to take on the No. 4 Michigan Wolverines. Kuzara and assistant coach May May Leung both have maize and blue blood, having graduated from Michigan. Kuzara served a three-year stint at Michigan as an assistant coach, establishing the team as a national powerhouse. Leung was a four-year letterwinner for the Wolverines through 1995.

"We need to improve on the bars, despite how we did today, and also on the beam," said Kuzara. "They are going to be the bookend events at Michigan. Our veterans will need to step it up a notch."

Lady Vols stay unanimous for year in AP poll

By Chuck Schoffner
Associated Press

Tennessee completed a run at the top of The Associated Press women's basketball poll yesterday that was just as impressive as its romp through the season.

Coach Pat Summitt's Lady Vols remained a unanimous choice for No. 1 in the final poll, making them the first team in 13 years and only the fourth of all time to go wire-to-wire at the top. It also marked the fifth time Tennessee finished the season ranked No. 1. Louisiana Tech and Texas are next in that category with four No. 1 finishes.

Tennessee (33-0), which has outscored its opponents by an average of 31 points a game, begins its bid for a third consecutive NCAA championship on Saturday against Liberty, the nation's only other unbeaten Division I team.

Only two NCAA champions have gone unbeaten — Connecticut in 1995 and Texas in 1986.

"Being 33-0, I don't know how this team will respond in postseason," Summitt said. "Practice is the only thing I have to go on right now and they are as motivated and competitive in practice, maybe even more so, than they've been all year.

"They appear very excited and very focused on winning one game at a time. Certainly I feel good about them right now."

With all 40 first-place votes from a national media panel, Tennessee ended up being a unanimous No. 1 in all but the first two polls this season. Texas in 1985-86 was the last team to be ranked No. 1 all season. Louisiana Tech twice lasted all season on top, 1980-81 and 1981-82.

The final Top Ten was unchanged from last week as those teams either won at their games or were idle. But there were two newcomers lower down in the list — No. 21 Purdue and No. 22 Drake. Old Dominion was second and Connecticut third, followed by Louisiana Tech, Stanford, Texas Tech, North Carolina, Duke, Arizona and North Carolina State.

Old Dominion led Connecticut by three points in last week's voting. The margin was much greater this time, 944-912.

Alabama, the only team to get closer than 10 points to Tennessee this season, moved up on spot to head the Second Ten. Then it was Florida International, Florida, Clemson and Western Kentucky, followed by Illinois, Virginia, Vanderbilt, Stephen F. Austin and Hawaii.

The final five were Purdue, Drake, Iowa, Iowa State and UCLA. Purdue, which won the Big Ten tournament, rejoined the Top 25 after being out for six weeks. The Boilermakers played well down the stretch and earned a No. 4 seed in the NCAA tournament. Drake, the regular-season and tournament champion the Missouri Valley Conference, made the poll for the first time since the week of Jan. 17, 1995. The Bulldogs were 23rd then, the only time they were ranked that season.

Women's water polo reach 6–0

By Paul Teves
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts women's waterpolo team destroyed the competition this weekend at the Harvard Invitational. Beating both rivals Brown University and Princeton, the Minutewomen continued to roll on their perfect season.

UMass disposed of Brown in impressive fashion with a 19–2 victory and then proceeded to beat Princeton 10–2 for the second time in this young season.

"The defense was the key. We're defense oriented and then we try to structure an offense, and maybe later in the season we can open up our offense to where we really want to be," said assistant coach Dan McAuliffe.

Andrea Vazquez lead the assault on Brown, when she scored five goals. Vazquez also chipped in with 3 tallies against Princeton.

Katie Grogan was also a big part of this weekend's victories. She scored five goals in both games and she also chipped in with three assists against Princeton.

Marcie Hupp came through with three scores against Brown, and also netted one against Princeton.

"Hupp has been a leader, and it's good to see her score a few," said McAuliffe.

Claudia Clement another star sophomore, chipped in with four goals of her own. Her biggest contribution though, was her team-oriented effort of five assists against Brown.

The senior leaders Barbara Hickey and Lyndsay Crenshaw both were a factor in the Brown game, not only as leaders but also on the scoreboard. Crenshaw scored two while Hickey chipped in with one goal.

The other major contributions came from freshman Sarah Newell. She added to her scoring with two more goals this weekend. This brings her total to an even 6 tallies in six games for this young competitor. Melissa Edwards also scored two goals on their way to beating Brown.

"We went out and did what we had to do against Brown. It might have looked like just a beating but we are trying to prepare for the harder teams in California and that's what we had to do," said Edwards about the Brown victory.

The other contributor for the team emotionally was Maria Velazquez.

"She is so tough and she helps leads this team with her spirit. Her leadership is irreplaceable," said McAuliffe.

Peggy Nieves is the other big star of the weekend making 11 saves and only giving up four goals in two games. Nieves success is also the teams success in running the new defense called the front and lanes defense, which resembles a fullcourt press in basketball.

"It frustrates our opponents and they turn the ball over and many times just can't get passed mid-pool, so it has worked really well," said Edwards.

With the pair of wins this weekend, UMass (6–0) heads to California with a mission. This will provide the team exposure to the cream of the crop.

"We have a lot to prove and this tournament is really important to us," said Laurie Edwards about the tournament in California. "We're really looking forward to it."

Baseball falls to S. FL, 1–2

By Kathleen Ralls
Collegian Staff

It may sound crazy, but as the run totals decreased, the Massachusetts baseball team's luck improved this weekend. Despite returning 1–2, UMass improved with each game during their three–game series versus an experienced South Florida squad (9–12).

Friday's pitching matchup was between the Minutemen's Bill Cooke and John Vigue. Cooke struggled for 3 2/3 innings, allowing five hits, three walks and five earned runs while striking out just one. Vigue powered through for seven innings, compiling seven hits, three Ks and four earned runs to retain the win. UMass' Jeff Puleri pitched two innings and freshman Nick Skiranich inaugurated his collegiate career allowing just one run in 2 1/3 innings.

Offensively, South Florida sand–bagged UMass with 15 hits for 13 runs. The infield provided most of the punch as third baseman Dan Boyd led all hitters with a 3–for–4 day while utility infielder Mike Eylward drove in three runs on a 1–for–3 day.

The Minutemen struggled at the plate, only hitting .250 as a team. Bryan Massaferro was the one bright spot as he tallied three hits and scored a run. The rest of the team scattered five hits and earned six walks for six runs.

Saturday was much of the same affair as UMass' bats briefly flurried the field with just five hits, including two from Mazzaferro. Senior right–fielder Pete Gautreau scored the only run as they fell 6–1.

The Bulls battered senior co–captain Scott Barnsby for 16 hits and five earned runs. Centerfielder Bill Eaton led the way with four hits while four other batters added two apiece. South Florida's David Richtberg earned the win, going six innings and allowing four while facing 25 batters. UMass sophomore Travis Veracka went the distance in the final four innings, allowing six hits and racking up two K's.

The Minutemen retaliated on Sunday with a promising 4–2 victory. The highlight was senior Ryan Cameron toeing a complete game, the longest outing of his career. Cameron struck out a career–high 10 and retired the side in order in the ninth to clinch the win.

UMass jumped on the scoreboard first, producing two runs in the first. Shaun Skeffington led off with a walk and scored on a single off Steve Asadoorian's base hit. Mazzaferro added the second run when he reached on a fielder's choice and scored off a wild pitch.

The Minutemen were quiet until the eighth inning when they registered the second–coming of runs. Centerfielder Doug Clark smacked a double down the left field line to drive in freshman Nate Lang who had reached with a walk and Mazzaferro who was hit by a pitch. South Florida rallied but could only scrounge two runs in the eighth off one hit and a walk.

The Minutemen head back to Florida to face Seton Hall on Saturday.

Men's indoor track hobbles at IC4As

By Seth Koenig
Collegian Staff

Twelve Massachusetts men's indoor track runners qualified to go to Cornell University in Ithaca, New York to compete in the IC4A Championships. Eleven of those runners were healthy enough to make the trip. Only eight of those eleven were healthy enough to compete at full strength. At the end of the meet, one single Minuteman harrier completed the weekend with a place in the prestigious competition.

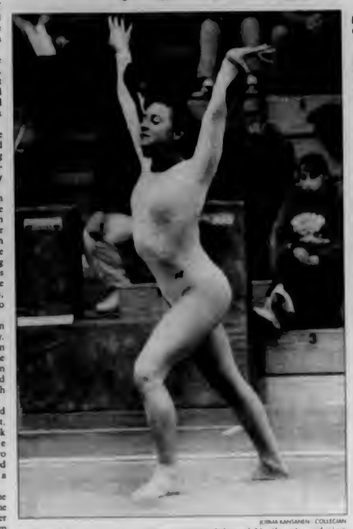
The long season has taken its toll on the UMass track team, as several of the runners who have qualified for the IC4A Championships, have limped past the finish line of their winter season.

Marc Sylvander missed the meet with a pulled hamstring suffered a week earlier. Slightly luckier was Ryan Carrara who entered the weekend recovering from a sinus infection. Scott Price and Tom Toye, both school record holders in the sprints, struggled through leg problems. Price, who at the New England Championships set the New England record in the 200–meter, had to pull out of that event and the 4x400– meter relay.

"We've been doing three championships in a row, and some people just ran out of gas," junior Neil Concepcion said. "A lot of people were hurt. Its the end of the season, so people are gearing down.

"We'd rather have Scott miss those races than the spring season."

Only 400–meter sprinter Concepcion snatched a place, pulling in sixth for three team points, leading the squad to a forty–sixth overall place among ninety schools. It was the junior's first time placing at such a level meet, and his time of 48.67 seconds pushed him into third on the all–time UMass list in that event.



"I was really happy with my performance," Concepcion said. "I went into the meet without any pressure of team scoring. It's kind of more of a fun meet without pressure."

The only other Minuteman who came relatively close to the top eight was Jan Stevens, who ranked 20th overall in the shot put with a heave of 49'25".

None of UMass' runners qualified for the NCAA Championships next weekend in Indianapolis, Indiana. That is a blessing in disguise as the outdoor season begins April 4th, at Llewelyn Derby Track here at the University of Massachusetts.

Final flips for gym seniors

The UMass women's gymnastics team defeated Northeastern during Senior Night this past weekend.

In 1994, Massachusetts women's gymnastics coach Dave Kuzara came to Amherst in pursuit of changing a mediocre team into a national contender. To start, he brought in Penny LeBeau and Karen Maurer as his first–ever recruiting class.

On Saturday, LeBeau and Maurer bid their final farewells to the confines of UMass that they have called home. Senior Night came and went, and the crowd let the duo know how much they have helped Minutewomen gymnastics grow.

UMass coasted to a 189.800–175.750 victory over Northeastern to improve to 9–4 on the season. It was the first–ever meeting between the two schools. LeBeau and Maurer anchored the exercises they had prepared for, a tradition started in Amherst three years ago.

"The focus was on the seniors and both Karen and Penny performed tremendously," said Kuzara. "It was a tribute to them and they deserved every second of the glory."

The Minutewomen swept three of four events, with the Huskies's Larissa Chercinski taking third place on the vault. The Huskies picked up their program this year after a long absence.

LeBeau rounded out the outstanding team performance by posting a career–high on the floor exercise with a 9.800, which was good for second place. Maurer's 9.675 placed her third on the event, also a career best.

Junior Anita Sanyal recorded a career–high 9.825 on the uneven bars to land in a first place tie with freshman Mary Moore. Sanyal also captured the balance beam title with a 9.55. Maurer found her way to the beam podium, placing second with a

The Heat is on for some

Jamie Jee on the NBA

As the NBA prepares to kick off the fourth quarter of the regular season, several teams have begun to jockey for the top playoff spots, while others hope to either stay or join in the race.

The Bulls and Sonics remain the front runners in their respective conferences, with Utah charging hard in the West and Miami also playing well as of late in the East. The Heat are winners of nine out of their last ten, and remain the league's best on the road at 22–11.

They may have to take the third seed behind Indiana, however, as the Pacers continue to shut down opponents with excellent defense. Seattle may be the team to beat come June, though, as they hold a commanding 7–1 record against the next top four teams which are Chicago (1–1), Indiana (2– 0), L.A. (2–0), and Miami (2–0).

Even better on defense has been New York, even though Michael Jordan dropped 42 points on them Sunday and received a standing ovation from a capacity Madison Square Garden crowd. Chicago won the game 102–89 as Jordan extended his individual scoring lead while wearing his 1984 edition throwback sneaks.

After Laker center Shaquille O'Neal blasted almost everyone but himself in a post–game harangue last week that came after L.A.'s 96–86 loss to the Wizards, the Sunshine Kids have won three straight to put them three and a half games out in the Pac–7. O'Neal had lambasted his teammates for being a bunch of Rex Chapman shooting, trigger–happy incompetents after Rick Fox and Eddie Jones combined to go 4–12 from behind the arc. Hey, is that an insult?

Let's just hope Shaq simply got up on the wrong side of the bed and was a bit frustrated after rumors began to swirl concerning the firing of head coach Del Harris. If not, he may want to be a bit more careful in the future and remember that whatever foibles his friends may have from downtown, it could be poor free throw shooting that hinders the Lakers' playoff run, with O'Neal has contributing more than his share of misses. What he and the team will need more of is something to the order of what he did last Wednesday in L.A.'s win over the Pacers, as he went 13–15 from the charity stripe.

Switching over to the television circuit is recently reinstated Latrell Sprewell. Appearing Sunday on CBS' 60 Minutes, Sprewell will round out the week with stops on ABC's Good Morning America, CNN/SI and ESPN. He stated Sunday that "it wasn't a choke" and that he "wasn't trying to kill P.J. [Carlesimo]." Sprewell has admitted that he did "lose control to a certain degree" and told his children that he made a mistake and that they should not handle similar situations with physical force. The Warriors can trade Sprewell at the end of the NBA season in April, providing that team has not made the playoffs.

Speaking of sprees, Rod Strickland has been on one since the All–Star break in an effort to show that it was a travesty to put an inexperienced Kobe Bryant (who appears to have hit the wall) on the West team despite the fact that Strickland is having a banner year and has been playing better ball that just about anyone right now.

Also there with Strickland in the upper echelon of point guards is Celtic floor leader Kenny Anderson. According to head coach Rick Pitino, the pick and roll constitutes about 60 percent of the offense and both players happen to be pick and roll masters. Anderson believes Strickland may be continually slighted come All–Star time because "when you're quiet and people don't know you, they start assuming something is wrong."

There is something definitely wrong with the Denver Nuggets this year. Currently at the bottom of the league standings with a 5–56 mark, the mile–low Nuggets are seriously challenging for the title of All–Time Worst Team. With the 1972–73 Philadelphia 76ers clinging to that coveted spot dearly, Denver needs to win at least five out of their last 21 to avoid joining them.

Continuing their surge Sunday were the streaking Charlotte Hornets, extending to eight straight victories with their 109– 100 win over the Nets Sunday.

Games of the Week: It's an inter–east coast showdown as the Heat will have their road strength tested tonight as they visit the conference leading Bulls who have been the best at home this season. Also tonight, the Nets visit the Spurs as two of the league's top rookies in Keith Van Horn and Tim Duncan go head to head.

Quote of the Week: "I might have to break somebody's facial structure to get a call." — L.A. Laker center Shaquille O'Neal following L.A.'s loss to the Washington Wizards last week.

UMass skier competes for Israeli national team

By Bryan Schwartzman
Collegian Staff

Imagine being 25 years old and racing for a third national Telemark ski team, dreaming of competing in the 2002 Olympic Festival in Salt Lake City.

David Block, a Masters student in Regional Planning, knows all about it.

As the holder of tri–citizenship, he has competed at the World Cup level for his native France, the United States, and is now the first ever telemark skier competing for Israel.

"I knew I wanted to ski for Israel,, there is no (downhill) skiing in Israel, only water skiing," Block said.

Block, who is ranked among the top 30 in the world for telemark skiing, said he enjoyed competing for the United States but finds the advantages in competing for Israel. First, he considers himself an active Zionist (an active supporter for the state of Israel) and competing for Israel allows him to express this. A more pragmatic motive is competing for Israel nearly guaranteed him a spot in the Olympics; and access to all the resources that should be guaranteed.

"The United States team does not provide much in the way of support for peripheral sports [such as telemark.]" UMass ski coach Bill MacConnell said.

Israel is new to competitive skiing and competes in the small European ski Nations which includes Lebanon, Cyprus, Holland, Belgium, Iceland, Denmark and Portugal. These teams need to qualify in order to compete in the World Cup, so Israel was anxious to grab a world class skier.

"I was about two years old when I put on my first pair of skis," said Bloch.

"I love it all. The traveling is great, competing and getting to know the other skiers."

Both his father and his grandfather were competitive skiers. The younger Bloch was competing in Alpine races by the time he was seven.

Poor grades prevented him from attending ski camp, and he decided to try telemarking.

Named for a region in Norway, telemark is actually the oldest forum of competitive skiing, dating back to the 1870s. The skis are similar to cross country and jumping skies since the heel is not bound to the ski, thus allowing more flexibility. This produces a very different technique which allows for more knee bend and placing one ski in front of the other.

Block said that in the 1920s there were far too many accidents involving telemark skiing so the entire foot was bound to the ski and it became Alpine skiing. Alpine became the dominant mode of skiing and telemark did not resurface until the 80s.

"Once you have tried telemarking you won't want to go back, [to Alpine skiing and snowboarding]" he said.

Block did not discard Alpine skiing entirely. He raced two years for the UMass ski team.

"Alpine technique is extremely different from telemark technique," MacConnell said.

Along the way, he received his undergraduate degree from UMass in Urban Forestry.

As luck would have it, MacConnell was not only the ski coach but a faculty member in the department.

MacConnell said although Block was ranked 10th out of 10 skiers on his team, he was still a valuable member.

"David is a terrific athlete. [In our department] doing urban street work he was often swinging on a tire through trees with a chain saw running," said MacConnell in reference to Bloch's athleticism.

One day he hopes to apply his skills to running a ski resort. For now he will continue his graduate studies and trying to attend as many World Cup competitions as possible.

On March 20th Block and the other world class skiers will flock to Salt Lake City for another stop on the World Cup train, where he hopes to be in four years.

Bomb kills 10 on Pakistani train

LAHORE, Pakistan (AP) — A bomb exploded yesterday on a train entering the Lahore station, killing 10 people and injuring more than 80, Pakistani police said.

The explosion in Lahore, capital of the eastern Punjab province, followed two blasts Monday that killed 13 people and wounded at least 50.

No one has taken responsibility for any of the attacks, but the government blamed India.

The latest bomb exploded as a train packed with passengers rolled into the Walton station, about a mile from the home of Prime Minister Nawaz Sharif.

"There was blood everywhere and people were screaming and weeping," passenger Liaquat Ali said.

Authorities believe a timed explosive was planted on the train at an earlier stop.

Most victims were laborers traveling to Lahore for work from the Punjab town of Kasur, 50 miles south near Pakistan's border with India.

"Smoke was pouring out of the carriages and many of the bodies were burned beyond recognition or ripped apart," said Mohammed Hussain, an ambulance driver.

Police used hacksaws to free passengers from the wreckage, witnesses said.

JonBenet case could go to grand jury

BOULDER, Colo. (AP) — The 15–month–old investigation into JonBenet Ramsey's killing may finally be heading for a grand jury, the head prosecutor hinted.

"It has been an option for a long time and it has become a matter of more serious consideration at this point in time," District Attorney Alex Hunter said Monday.

He declined to elaborate except to say: "We are evaluating if there is a basis [to convene a grand jury] and if it would advance the investigation."

Lawyers for the family of the slain 6–year old beauty queen declined to comment.

Grand jury proceedings, which are secret, are sometimes used to force uncooperative witnesses to testify.

A grand jury may issue an indictment to arrest someone for probable cause, a lower standard than the threshold of beyond a reasonable doubt that must be met to find someone guilty at trial. Hunter's office rarely uses grand juries, but some detectives has been pushing for one in this case.

JonBenet was found strangled and beaten in the basement of her home on Dec. 26, 1996, hours after her mother reported finding a ransom note. Her millionaire father and mother, at odds with police almost since the investigation began, haven't been ruled out as suspects.

UMass student dead after fall

By Leigh Faulkner
Collegian Staff

University of Massachusetts sophomore Andrew B. Sala, 19, of Mendon died yesterday morning after allegedly falling from a window in Cashin Residence Hall.

Sala's body was found on the first–floor ledge of Cashin at approximately 8:30 a.m.

According to a press release issued by the University News office, UMass police were notified about the incident by a Residemi Assistant and they immediately called the Amherst Fire department for an ambulance.

"Ambulance personnel were unable to assist due to obvious signs of death. At that time, the medical examiner was called and pronounced him dead," the press release stated.

Very little information was known about Sala's cause of death last night.

"He was found this morning. A resident of Cashin awakened to raise his shade and saw Andrew's body there. At this time we have no indication of how long he may have been there," Dean of Students Jo–Anne Vanin said in a press conference last night.

Although it has not been determined that Sala fell out his fifth floor room window, Vanin said the window in Sylvan residence halls "are split windows that open in and out, as opposed to up and down."

Cashin resident, freshman Melissa Johnson, who lives on the second floor, said screens exist on the bottom part of the windows but not on the top.

Johnson said she woke up before 9 a.m. to commotion outside her window.

"I heard police officers and their walkie talkies. So I got up to look out my window and I saw him laying on the first floor balcony," she said.

UMass Police Chief John Luippold would not comment on the investigation, however campus and state police are working together to investigate the incident.

No foul play is suspected.

The University is waiting for results from the Medical Examiner's Office for the cause of death, Vanin said.

Following investigations conducted yesterday, Vanin said there is no reason to suspect suicide.

"We have found nothing unusual in terms of his day and we have found no indication of any distress," she said.

According to his friends, Sala "had a regular day of classes and had an exam [Monday] night," Vanin said.

She also added that Sala was in good academic standing and had recently made plans to change his major from chemical engineering to management.

"This is a very sad time for our campus. these unexpected deaths are very hard to explain," Vanin said.

Residence Hall staff are working with friends and acquaintances; chaplains and counselors are available for support for all members of the UMass community.

"The impact on the community of the death of a student can be devastating not only for students, but for faculty and staff as well," Vanin said.

In an campus–wide email sent last night to the entire UMass community, Vanin wrote, "This is a time for us to reach out and support each other as we reflect on this very sad time."

Campus resources are available to student and faculty who need assistance with during their time of grief.

Mental Health Services can be reached at 545–2337, the Dean of Students Office can be reached at 545–2684, the Employee Assistance Program can be reached at 545–0350 In addition, student can also contact Public Safety at 545–2121 or University Health Services at 577–5000 for emergency help.

Amy Pellegrino wins presidency amid SGA election controversy

Eleanor Court voted in as student trustee

By Jill Carroll
Collegian Staff

After three recounts and amid controversy over one polling place temporarily taking two valid candidates off the ballot, the University of Massachusetts Student Government Association (SGA) election results were announced last night.

Amy Pellegrino won the race for SGA president and Eleanor Court won for student trustee.

The first announcement of the results was inaccurate because Chancellor of Elections Carlos Alvarez read a number on the voting ballots wrong.

"I misread one of the numbers of the machine report," Alvarez said.

A second count of the numbers revealed Pellegrino had won for president and Court for student trustee.

"I'm absolutely sure we got the numbers right," Alvarez said.

After the recounts, the elections commission voted in favor of ratifying the elections. This ratification, however, is a moot point because the senate will vote today to ratify the elections.

If the senate does not ratify these elections they will be dismissed and new elections will have to be held for SGA president and student trustee sometime this semester.

Pellegrino and Court had different reactions to their victories.

"I thought I was going to come in third this afternoon" Pellegrino said.

"I don't feel any pleasure in winning because the election was so poorly run. It doesn't reelect students votes. I feel there should be another election," Court said.

Some of the reasons Court felt the elections were mismanaged was due to mistakes in covering the names of candidates that had been nullified.

One mistake was discovered in Franklin dining commons yesterday. Tape was placed over the names of Jesse Burchfield, candidate for president, and Brenda Fitzpatrick, candidate for student trustee, who were valid candidates.

Fitzpatrick was told by a friend her name was covered up.

"I was outside the dining commons and my friend came out and told me 'I went to vote for you but your names weren't there.' I went in and talked to the elections commissioner [who runs the polling place] and said 'Our names are covered.'

"When I asked him to change it he didn't even know who we were on the ballot," Fitzpatrick said.

Elections commissioner Peter Bantton, who ran the Franklin polling place, could not be reached for comment.

Burchfield felt this significantly hurt his and Fitzpatrick's campaign because Franklin dining hall was an area in which they extensively campaigned.

"If it was in Southwest I wouldn't be concerned. We went to every door in Northeast and Orchard Hill. For it to happen in Franklin is a big blow to us," Burchfield said.

Burchfield and Fitzpatrick felt shocked and disenchanted.

"We're really upset right now. We're sort of in shock," Fitzpatrick said.

"You just get sort of disenchanted. We don't know the time it [Burchfield and Fitzpatrick's name] was gone or how many days. It could have been covered since [Monday]," Burchfield said.

Another mistake involving covering the names of the nullified candidates was in Berkshire dining commons.

"I know in Berkshire there were no tapes over any of the names and they [nullified candidates] got a significant number of votes," Court said.

Court felt if these votes had gone toward valid candidates it might have changed the outcome of the elections.

"I only won by 56 votes so if all those people voted for Jeff Howe I could have lost," Court said.

The issue of Burchfield and Fitzpatrick's name's being covered up, was not considered when the elections commission ratified the elections.

Burchfield and Fitzpatrick feel there should be new elections because these mistake were not considered when ratifying the elections.

"I feel Carlos has put expediency ahead of democracy," Burchfield said.

"I strongly believe there should be a new election. That too many things went wrong to consider this a valid election," Fitzpatrick said.

Alvarez does not see a need for new elections calling the elections "successful."

"It was a successful election," Alvarez said.

Alvarez said the names were covered for a half an hour and only three people voted in that time. He therefore felt this made the Franklin polling place blunder insignificant.

"You're always going to have minor imperfections. Knowing how many people vote in a half an hour it's simply impossible [to impact the election] especially during non–peak hours. It's sad it had to happen but at the same time three votes wouldn't change anything," Alvarez said.

The three referendum questions results were also returned.

The student majority voted "no" on a question asking if the 24–hour card scanner in dorms had increased security

Public Policy series to start with Wilson

By Laura Jakutowicz
Collegian Correspondent

A nationally known author and expert on race, poverty, urban policy and the role of class in American society, William Julius Wilson will speak at the University of Massachusetts, tomorrow, March 12 at 3 p.m. in Bowker Auditorium in Stockbridge Hall.

This talk will be the first in the University's new Public Policy Lecture Series.

Wilson's speech will serve as the inaugural event for the new interdisciplinary Center for Public Policy and Administration (CPPA) at UMass, said John A. Hird, CPPA director.

"This is an exciting way for the center to begin what we hope is an ongoing dialogue with the community about critically important public policy issues," Hird said in a press release.

Wilson, who taught at UMass from 1965–1971, received the UMass Distinguished Teacher of the Year Award in 1970. He was awarded an honorary doctorate degree from the University in 1982.

Wilson is now the Malcolm Wiener Professor of Social Policy at the John F. Kennedy School of Government at Harvard University and professor in Harvard's department of Afro–American studies.

Wilson has also been chosen by Time magazine as one of America's most influential people. He is also the author of several books, including "When Work Disappears: The World of the New Urban Poor." This book was selected as one of the notable books of 1996 by the editors of the New York Times Book Review; it also received the Sidney Hillman Foundation Award.

Several national boards and committees claim Wilson as a member, including the President's Commission on White House Fellowships, the National Urban League, the Center for Advanced Study of Behavioral Sciences, the Twentieth Century Fund, and the Russell Sage Foundation.

He has been elected to the National Academy of Sciences, the American Academy of Arts and Sciences, the National Academy of Education, and the American Philosophical Society. Wilson is the past president of the American Sociological Society and is a MacArthur Prize Fellow.

The public is invited to attend this talk. Admission is free of charge.

Pinochet ends army years, will now be senator for life

By Eduardo Gallardo
Associated Press

SANTIAGO, Chile — With tears in his eyes, Gen. Augusto Pinochet stepped down yesterday as army commander after a 65–year military career that turned him into one of Latin America's longest–serving dictators.

Pinochet made no reference in his farewell speech to his controversial next stop: the Senate seat for life he assumes today, a perk of the constitution written during his 1973–1990 dictatorship.

Today's handover ceremony had a tense start when some in the audience — mostly relatives of military men — booed President Eduardo Frei amid chants of "Pinochet! Pinochet!"

Police used tear gas and water cannons in downtown Santiago to scatter hundreds of demonstrators protesting the Senate seat for Pinochet. Protesters also went to the Congress building in the port city of Valparaiso.

Some demonstrators and one television cameraman were beaten by police. One news photographer was seen bleeding from the head, apparently hit by a rock tossed by demonstrators.

Frei has been an outspoken critic of the 82–year–old Pinochet assuming the Senate seat, but concedes he is powerless to stop him. Pinochet's critics say a man who shut down Congress after taking power in a bloody military coup has no place in the legislature. Pinochet was accused of widescale human rights abuses during his long reign, including more than 3,000 political killings, according to official figures.

■ military

Yesterday's ceremony was in the lavish military style Pinochet prefers. He was honored by a parade of 3,000 soldiers from every military garrison in Chile. Two-thousand guests also attended. "Fatherland of mine, I've been your soldier and that makes me happy," Pinochet declared. "As I retire today, I can say I leave the army in a situation that is a reason of pride for Chile."

In his speech, Pinochet recalled the 1973 coup in which he toppled leftist President Salvador Allende, but insisted the military was forced to act because the nation "was on the brink of self destruction."

"I do not want to look back because that anchors the country in the past," he said. But, "the armed forces can now proudly say: Mission accomplished."

When Pinochet went briefly to the presidential palace Monday night for a formal farewell to Frei, police had to use water cannons to scatter demonstrators.

The clash reflected the growing opposition to Pinochet assuming the Senate seat — a position he receives as former president under the constitution he wrote. His constitution also made him commander of the military after he stepped down from the presidency. Some lawmakers are planning to begin proceedings to impeach Pinochet the minute he sits in Congress. But their effort appears sure to fail because the right-wing opposition holds a majority in the Senate.

A quarter-century ago, Pinochet was named army commander by Allende, whom he toppled 19 days later in a coup in which Allende died.

Pinochet clearly retains a large military backing. Last Friday, all 45 army generals named him "meritorious commander in chief," a title that while only honorary, was seen by both pro-government and opposition politicians as a signal of army support.

His successor, Gen. Ricardo Izurieta, is widely viewed as a professional soldier with no political aspirations. He held no political position in the Pinochet government and has never been linked to its human rights violations.

Au pair's fate in hands of state's highest court

By Alexia Chiu
Associated Press

BOSTON — Louise Woodward wants to go to college. She doesn't know what her major will be or when she'll start. Mainly, says defense attorney Elaine Whitfield Sharp, the 20-year-old just knows she wants to go home.

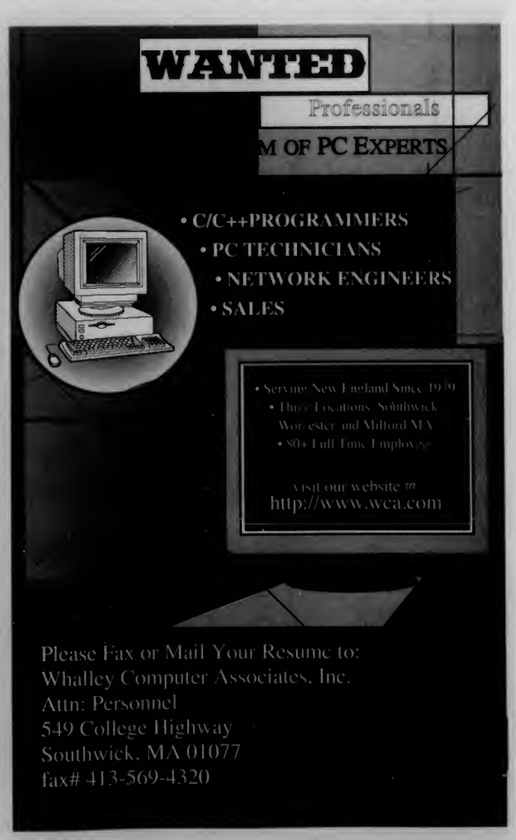
But Woodward's fate has rested with the Massachusetts legal system since Feb. 4, 1997, when she was arrested and charged with killing an 8-month-old baby in her care. Now, the British au pair's future is in the hands of the state's highest court.

"The hardest thing in the world is just sitting and waiting," said Sharp, a member of Woodward's defense team. "And the question is, will she or won't she go back to prison for the rest of her life?"

The Supreme Judicial Court heard appeals from both sides Monday and is expected to rule on Woodward's case in the next four months. The seven-member panel could either send her back to prison, order a new trial or send her home to her native England. At Monday's hearing, Woodward sat with her parents and watched as justices fired a steady barrage of questions at attorneys for both sides.

Defense lawyers focused on medical evidence they said shows Matthew Eappen died from head injuries he sustained before Feb. 4, the day Woodward called police to report the baby was having trouble breathing.

"You're asking us, who are not trained in this area, to say that your evidence is so clear that it simply shuts the case down?" Justice Charles Fried asked defense attorney Andrew Good. "That's correct, your honor," he replied.



Good said he would want the body of the child exhumed for examination if the case were retried.

Prosecutors argued that Superior Court Judge Hiller Zobel erred in reducing Woodward's sentence and asked that the second-degree murder verdict be reinstated.

Assistant Middlesex District Attorney Sabita Singh said the judge was out of bounds when he overruled the jury's decision. "Why should anyone come for jury service if what they do can just be thrown out," Ms. Singh asked.

Woodward was accused of violently shaking and slamming Matthew Eappen the day she called police. The baby died five days later.

Captain Video places vending machine on Campus Center Concourse

By Jason Eiseman
Collegian Staff

Never fear, Captain Video is here!

Captain Video vending machine has been placed on the University of Massachusetts Campus Center Concourse, right outside of the Coffee Shop, to satisfy the video rental needs of the campus community.

John Kuusisto, General Manager of the University Store, said a survey was conducted in the Campus Center and he found that students were requesting a video rental service on campus.

Nolan Anaya, owner of Captain Video in North Amherst, said he also conducted a survey in the residences, and found that about 85- 90 percent of the students he asked had a VCR, but could not go off-campus to rent a video.

"It's wild," Anaya said. "It's basically just like an ATM." Anaya said students must get a membership, which are available today at a table on the Campus Center Concourse. Afterwards students can get a membership at the University Store.

Students will then go to the vending machine, and run their card through. The machine will then ask the person how many videos they want to rent. The video vending machine offers two videos for two dollars per day. On weekends students can rent videos for three dollars for the entire weekend. Students can choose from 320 videos.

Once a video is chosen, a robotic arm picks the video out of the slot, and puts it into the door on the right, a light goes on, and the student takes the tape. When they return the video, they swipe the card again, and the robotic arm picks it up.

Anaya said security is a big issue with this vending machine. He said that there is a tilt alarm, so if the machine is rattled an alarm would go off. He said the plexiglass protecting the videos is thick and almost bulletproof.

In addition, the building is secured by the University as well. Kuusisto said it is ultimately the responsibility of Captain Video to secure the machine.

Kuusisto is excited about the idea. "What a great idea," he said. "Let's hope it works. I'll probably rent one this weekend, just to see if it works."

Anaya said this is one of the most sophisticated video rental machines around, and is one of the first at a university.

"It's our first machine to find out how it goes," Anaya said.

Relatives claim dead in Kosovo

By Dusan Stojanovic
Associated Press

SRBICA, Yugoslavia — Ethnic Albanians solemnly filed past charred and bullet-riddled corpses shrouded by long white sheets, trying yesterday to recognize relatives killed in a police crackdown in Kosovo province.

Serb police threatened to bury the dead in a mass grave if the decomposing bodies were not claimed yesterday. Relatives, who want independent autopsies, charge the Serbs want to cover up atrocities. At least four children and a dozen women were among the corpses lying on the construction yard floor. Some were missing limbs, apparently blown off in explosions. Others had bullet holes, and a few were burned beyond recognition.

"Look what the Serb savages did. They killed women and children," said a man who identified himself only as Fazli. "How does anyone expect us to forget this terrible massacre?"

Turmoil in Kosovo, a southern province of Yugoslavia, has caused fears that neighboring Balkan countries might be drawn into the conflict. Ethnic Albanians outnumber Serbs in Kosovo 9-1 and many want to secede from Serbia, the dominant republic in the Yugoslav federation.

The official death toll from last week's violence is 46 ethnic Albanians and six Serb police. The Albanians say at least 77 of their kin died in two police sweeps through a region west of Pristina, Kosovo's capital. Twenty-five were buried last week at a funeral attended by 30,000 mourners.

A list published in a local newspaper identified 29 of those killed, including 22 members of Adem Jashari's family. Serbs say Jashari was the leader of a militant group known as the Kosovo Liberation Army.

Reporters reached the shed containing the bodies by traveling on side roads and walking into virtually deserted Srbica, the region 25 miles west of Pristina that was at the center of the crackdown. Police stood guard at the entrance to the shed and an armored personnel carrier was parked 50 yards away with its gun turret pointed at the crowd of some 50 mourners.

Grim-faced Albanian men stood in ankle-deep mud in front of the corpses, many averting their eyes from the gruesome sight. The stench of decomposing flesh was overpowering.

One dead woman appeared to have been pregnant. One small, dark-haired dead boy with open eyes seemed as if he was reaching out for his mother, who lay next to him.

When Fazli found his brother among the dead, he knelt next to the corpse, which had half an arm chopped off. He sobbed quietly.

"This genocide has dashed all hopes that we could live together with Serbs again," said a man who gave his name as Resbep.

The top U.S. envoy to the Balkans, Robert Gelbard, arrived in Pristina in search of a diplomatic solution to the violence. He met with the leader of the main ethnic Albanian party, Ibrahim Rugova, who advocates a peaceful struggle for independence from Serbia. Gelbard said afterward that he was "very much in agreement" with Rugova on most issues, with most — but not all — of the onus on Yugoslav President Slobodan Milosevic.

"Violence must be stopped on both sides immediately," he said. The president Montenegro, the only other republic in Yugoslavia, criticized Milosevic for allowing the Kosovo problem to fester. Kosovo "has been long neglected and naively underestimated," said Montenegrin leader Milo Djukanovic.

Independence for Kosovo would mean a change of borders, something that has traditionally sparked war in the Balkans. Outsiders have condemned the Serbian police violence and repression used to rule Kosovo since Milosevic stripped the province of its autonomy in 1989.

Surviving air travel

On Friday, like many of you, I will be strapping myself into a seat approximately 15 inches wide and chowing down a dinner consisting of a scrap of bread, dead lettuce and a stale cookie. As some airlines would proudly say, welcome to the friendly skies.

Seema Gangatirkar

Most people have a love-hate relationship with flying. barf bags are provided for those who hate the feeling of knowing that there is nothing but three miles of atmosphere between them and the ground.

Luckily for me, I love to fly. During winter break, I logged close to 60 hours in the air and while my sanity was threatened by boredom and the constant showings of George of the Jungle, I've come to develop a new appreciation for this mode of travel.

There is an art to flying. After careful analysis, I've come up with some ways to make flying much more enjoyable and comfortable.

Before flying, it is always necessary to hit the airport bookstore and pick up the latest John Grisham paperback. Without fail, 90 percent of the travelers in an any given airport will be clutching a Grisham masterpiece. The new-bie flyer may err and pick up a Danielle Steel or Tom Clancy. If you want to fit in, grab a Grisham.

There is an exception to the Grisham rule, however; if you are traveling on business, you are allowed a copy of the Wall Street Journal and The 7 Habits of Highly Effective People. You will also be able to recognize the well-prepared businessperson; he or she will accessorize well with a laptop and a cell phone.

Once on the plane, avoid the window seat with a passion; the view is all very nice but it's damn inconvenient when you start to feel the effects of those eight Diet Cokes you've gulped down.

Going anywhere requires traveling down the center aisle. If you wear a shoe bigger than size nine, you're automatically out of luck. The aisle was sized for Lilliputians and none of us regular-sized people will ever manage to proceed carefully down to our destination without landing in a fellow passenger's lap.

Air trips always start out with the safety information. You know, that whole drill about seats being in the upright position and the life jacket being underneath your seat. I love this drill. Somehow, knowing my seat is in an upright position gives me the confidence I could survive any major air disaster, from turbulence to a bombing.

Following the safety drill, it's time to taxi off and hit the skies. Once the pilot has assured us that we have reached the cruising level of 33,000 feet, you can relax and enjoy some of that delicious gourmet food.

> "After careful analysis, I've come up with some ways to make flying much more enjoyable and comfortable."

Airlines lately have been awfully generous with their food. Sometimes, in addition to a limp salad, old desert and tough entree, we also get an extra bag of peanuts. The peanuts are vacuum sealed by a highly secretive process and opening the little bag is often a feat of complex engineering on my part. Usually, after all that effort, the bag reveals about six peanuts — half of which spill onto the floor.

Part of the dining experience is the wide variety of beverages offered to compliment the meal. I've learned in my experience that it doesn't matter what time of day it is or what the meal is, many people immediately latch onto the prospect of alcohol. At dinner it might not seem so strange, but at breakfast, the "Yes, I'd like a chardonnay with my bacon and eggs" sounds a little suspicious.

After dinner, there are those individuals who snuggle up with a thin blanket (courtesy of your airline) and a tiny pillow (you know, the one that's big enough for your ear), but then there are those others — the chatty ones.

It's useless to avoid these talkative people. The fact that you are actually in the air makes escape impossible. It's not like you can leave the airplane. The best bet is to pretend you're sleeping or really engrossed in John Grisham.

But sometimes, your chatty neighbor just won't get these subtle little hints. I sat next to one of these types recently; the woman was telling me all about her recent win at the Curling World Championships while her 4-year-old daughter proceeded to climb all over my lap.

"No, I don't mind, really," I found myself saying. "I really don't mind an additional 50 pounds on my lap for the next five hours."

By the time we landed in Dallas, I knew everything there was to know about this curling champion, including the color of her house.

Disembarking is often violent. For some reason, people just can't wait to get off the plane. I understand; various appendages of mine are tingling with anticipation also. Yet, many times, people are scrambling over bodies and reaching for their baggage while simultaneously punching a fellow passenger in the nose or gut.

Once on the ground, it's impossible to hold back the sigh of relief. Safe and exciting as flying may be, it's always good to be back on solid ground.

The war to end all wars

Slay me, baby, 'cause I'm the messenger.

I knew it might fall upon me, this nasty duty that had to be carried out. Sometimes you just have to be the bearer of bad news. But, before I get too ahead of myself, let's begin at the beginning.

There are people who I call friends, see. They live on opposite sides of the law — natural law, that is. Some are English majors and others are SOM majors. This was never a problem, however, until The Decision came down.

The powers–that–be, in an ill–planned integrationist maneuver, made the casual call to place some SOM classes in Bartlett and vice versa. I remembered what my fifth grade history teacher had said all those years ago: "Two cultures, one area — conflict."

Oh, crapballs. I thought. It's a Little Rock for the '90s and no one's even prepared. The jihad would start quietly enough, but in time what atrocities would occur when Southwest met Central? When CK met Eau de Terre? When New Jersey met Vermont? The horror.

But I, an astute journalism student, was already armed with my assessment. My chums who were polarized by major had always been marked by their petty jabs at the opposite course of study. Thus, all I had to do was lay out all the pros and cons of each, hopefully in the process eliminating all that unfounded elitism.

Folks, they may kill me for this. This possible martyr–to– be is going to consult Salman Rushdie on good hiding places and how to hang out with U2 without getting shot, so enjoy, learn and live:

Solidarity with Albania

As students at a public university marked by struggles, such as the Graduate Employee Organization (GEO) contract and Goodell, the issue of educational access ought to hold particular interest for us. But do we really understand the issue? How would we react if every university and college were to be shut down, inaccessible to us on the basis of our nationalities, whatever those might be?

The Albanian students of Kosova, southern Serbia, have been denied all access to their universities and most high schools for seven years — ever since the Serbian government announced an all-Serbian curriculum taught only in the Serbian language.

When the Albanian people — who make up 90 percent of the population — stated that they intended to continue education in their own curriculum and language, the Serbian authorities closed most of the schools to Albanians.

Why are the Serbians treating the Albanian majority so harshly? In addition to denying educational rights, when the current Serbian government came into power in 1990, they took health care away from all Albanians and fired 80 percent of Albanian government workers. That included doctors, nurses, teachers, professors and those who worked in the television, radio and newspaper industries — thus the Serbian government seized control of the media.

> "If we truly support the accessibility of education, then we must extend that to encompass the needs of these students who are discriminated against solely on the base of their ethnicity."
> Jennifer Connor

Was this done out of hatred? Serbian President Slobodan Milosevic's platform of Serbian nationalism deliberately played upon the fears of the Serbs in Kosova. In an area traditionally important to them, the Serbians were the minority. Because Milosevic was introducing policies extremely hostile to the Albanian majority, he could only enforce them through a government that is essentially a police state.

In the face of such intense repression, we might expect that the Albanians would react violently. Even Milosevic may have expected this, due to the area's war-torn history.

Igbala, a woman from Kosova, felt that the Serbians had been thrown off guard by the Albanians' non-violent response. But Serbians have had no excuse for retaliation until now, as terrorist acts by a small militant Albanian faction are on the rise.

News sources recently picked up on an incident in which four Serbian police were killed. In retaliation, at least 16 Albanians were killed, with reports that a statement from the ethnic Albanians' self-styled government said Serbian police and paramilitary forces had attacked unarmed Albanian civilians, including women and children, in several villages.

"Dead bodies could be seen lying everywhere, along the streets, on gardens, yards and fields," it said in a statement (Associated Press, March 1).

The reports of these events seem to be characterized by a tone of fatalism. What can we do? After all, if there are two armed groups, there will be clashes resulting in death. At least the Albanians are taking care of the situation themselves.

The truth is that the people of Albania do need international support, particularly the students. There is an active pacifist faction at work, marginalized by the government-controlled media. The student nonviolent movement, known as the Students Independent Union, has already engaged in three peaceful protests to regain access to their universities and they are gearing up for their fourth on March 13. In Prishtine alone, 20,000 students marched through streets lined with 80,000 supporters. The police surrounded the students.

According to one onlooker, David Hartsough, "After an hour and without warning, the police violently attacked the demonstrators, beat up and arrested the leaders of the independent student union. The contrast between the quiet, but powerful nonviolence of the students and the violence and brutal attack by the police was overwhelming. It reminded me of the march in Selma, Alabama in 1965 where the police mercilessly attacked nonviolent black marchers who were demanding the right to vote in the United States."

The importance of connecting such events lies in recognizing the effectiveness of nonviolence and the necessity of supporting it. We can also recognize that the situation in Kosova is not foreign to us. The students of Kosova have specifically asked for the support and awareness of students across the globe. If we truly support the accessibility of education, then we must extend that to encompass the needs of these students who are discriminated against solely on the base of their ethnicity.

"Dear students, devoting ourselves to the release of our buildings and premises, we are consecrating ourselves to our university, to our rights and freedoms, and to our future. Our future lies in our hands." These are the words of one of the presidents of the Students Independent Union.

These words lie in stark contrast to those of an Albanian militant leader: "'I saw all these empty hands yearning for weapons to fight for a free Kosova Guns,' he said softly. 'I need guns, guns, guns.'" (New York Times, 3/2/98).

The students are already using the weapons of their voices and minds and presences to at least try for the beginning of peaceful resolution in this area, rather than one more walking of the road to war.

Letters of support can be sent to the Students Independent Union in Pristina at uspup@albanian.com and letters of protest can be sent to President Slobodan Milosevic at Tolstojeva 33 / 11,000 Belgrade / Yugoslavia.

The doublethink of the 90s

Psycho, the ad

Drug companies are dropping their practice of limiting the advertising of prescription drugs just to medical professionals. Now even mental health drugs for depression and schizophrenia will be marketed directly to the consumers.

Alan Holmer, president of the Pharmaceutical Manufacturing Association, defends this direct marketing to potentially unbalanced consumers in these words: "This is the information age and more information empowers patients to be able to have more meaningful conversations with their doctors about cures and treatments."

Right on. I remember just how empowered I felt after watching the latest McDonald's commercial. And to those of you who haven't been having your share of meaningful conversations: Well, maybe a few more ads would do it for you.

Fortunately, says the Wall Street Journal, "There is no shortage of experts helping drug companies learn to think more like a Coke or a Nike." (Wall Street Journal, 2/10; New York Times, 2/17)

The welfare avoidance department

With the end of the Cold War, many of you may be wondering why we still need to spend billions so our Trident submarines can run around the oceans with nuclear missiles. Aren't our bombers and Intercontinental Ballistic Missiles (ICBM) missiles enough now?

Dead wrong, according to Rear Admiral Jerry Ellis, commander of our Pacific submarines. Admiral Ellis warned an audience recently at the Bangor sub base in Washington state that "It's only a matter of time until a weapon of mass destruction falls into the hands of a rogue nation or group."

Certainly a real threat. But from this our admiral goes on to conclude, "The Trident sub fleet will continue to be needed as a deterrent..." I know if I were a terrorist, a mere 10,000 nuclear bombs and missiles aimed at me wouldn't stop me unless I started seeing reinforcements in the harbor. Let's keep those Navy guys employed. (Seattle Post-Inquirer, 2/14)

Upstairs, downstairs in the friendly skies

Airlines are responding to the growing gap between the rich and the rest of us by, in the words of Business Week, "making the plush seats even 'plusher' and catering more to the needs of their business passengers. Socially conscious airlines like TWA will be squeezing coach seats 15 percent closer so that first class passengers can enjoy more space and seating. (Coach class passengers will presumably enjoy more... um, togetherness?)

Mark Shields, of Mercer Management Consulting, says that "Increasingly, people will be handled in subtly but importantly different ways." Much of the credit goes to computer software that now allows airline employees to target "profitable" customers and so meet their needs better. (Business Week, 2/23)

Smile, you're on candid camera

One of the big growth areas in the field of electronic surveillance is in the use of remote-controlled camera networks. Whole cities can now be viewed block by block by hundreds of strategically placed cameras feeding video images into a central control room. The Port of New York and New Jersey has taken the lead with a grand total of 1,200 cameras monitoring its bridges and airports.

> "Whole cities can now be viewed block by block by hundreds of strategically placed cameras feeding video images into a central control room."

Private companies are springing up to fill the need for complete video surveillance by police and TV stations. In New York, a video controller for the privately controlled Metro Networks is quoted as saying "Rule of thumb, if you can see the Empire State Building, we can see you."

Fortunately there is an important safeguard protecting citizens' privacy. Says Kevin O'Reilly, operations manager for Shadow Traffic Network, "But really, we don't have a lot of time to look at people's apartments."

That's the safeguard. (New York Times, 2/22)

CEO watch

It's been a long wait, but finally someone has descended from the country clubs to publicly defend the slightly exorbitant salaries and bonuses our top executives have been raking in.

Ira T. Kay, remember that name, came out in the pages of the Wall Street Journal to defend high Corporate Executive Officer (CEO) pay as a "crucial factor making the U.S. economy the most competitive in the world."

Why does paying our CEO's roughly 10 times more than their Japanese counterparts help make our companies more competitive? Obviously, you're not a professional economist if you need to ask. Because without the incentives, our CEO's would be in the same boat as Japanese managers, with "no economic incentive to face up to difficult management decisions, such as layoffs." So supporting those executive bonuses so we can get... fired, is Mr. Kay's inspired message. (Wall Street Journal, 2/23)

Turn it off

My experience with daytime television began in sixth grade. I was a member of the Phil Donahue and Oprah generation. My eyes were fixed as everyone, from authors on book tours to welfare mothers with cancer, paraded their stories in front of millions.

But Phil's topics back then pale compared to the racy themes of today's hosts. Heartwarming stories of adopted twins being reunited have been supplanted by Jerry Springer's recent "Big Busty Strippers" episode. Our jaded remote controls reflexively flip from any topic that might actually pertain to our own lives to the daily doses of the pathetic and outlandish offered by today's daytime kings.

Originally I'd intended to watch a full week of Jerry. I wanted to get a feel for what he was all about, what kind of topics he hoped to treat. After all, I hadn't seen him since his debut about six years ago. But I think after watching last Thursday's episode, featuring what possibly could be the world's most obese woman, I don't think I'm quite so interested.

> But none of this mock sympathy could disguise the fact that he was simply exploiting her, as we all were.
> Gerrit DeYoung

Obviously, Jerry's trashy. I know I'm going to step on some toes by desecrating the sacred cow of daytime TV, but he doesn't deserve his following — and his following is tremendous. Jerry's as safe a conversation starter as, "Have you seen Titanic?" Of course, none of us sophisticated soon– to–be college educated viewers buy into Jerry's message. We just watch it for the fights. But the fact that he's as popular as fat pants points to an alarming trend in our society.

This episode about the — gulp — 1600–pound woman is a frightening illustration. We are obsessed with the misery of others. This woman exposed herself, her 14–year–old daughter and her boyfriend to certain public humiliation. The cruelty of this arrangement was masked by Jerry's supposed sympathy for her plight. Throughout the show he wore a concerned mask. His face furrowed with worry every time he asked a question; he tenderly supported the woman's daughter after she broke out in tears while describing the torture she endured from her peers and even teachers.

But none of this mock sympathy could disguise the fact that he was simply exploiting her, as we all were. I guess it could be argued that trucking this woman across the nation's TV sets could bring greater awareness and sensitivity to the issues surrounding obesity. But this argument falls flat in the face of the fact that this woman's problem with her weight is monstrously out of proportion with most other people's.

To put it bluntly, Jerry and his cohorts offer us nothing more than the freak shows of yesterday's carnivals. Rather than flipper babies and bearded women, he features social oddities. The 1600–pound woman kept insisting her obesity was a result of her attempts to deal with childhood trauma. Another episode I saw dealt with a woman who lived with one boyfriend, slept with another and claimed to truly love two other fellow strippers.

I have to admit to watching with as much leering rapture as anyone else, but it's frightening we find the misery of others so entertaining. The men left by the wayside by the stripper must have been crushed. The woman herself, and her poor daughter, could not have felt any more accepted by the public after being on display in TV's carnival tent.

I have no problem with the escape provided by TV most of the time. But it's horrifying when it's delivered at the expense its subjects. When television serves to degrade our already tenuous self–worth, it's time to turn it off.

Letters to the Editor

Student's death a tragic loss

To the editor:

I do not believe anyone in Cashin, and indeed all of Sylvan, will be smiling much this week. With Spring Break approaching rapidly, a major blow to the University community was sustained early Tuesday morning. Andrew Sala's death was tragic and sudden, adding to the uneasiness of the situation.

Melissa and I were good friends with Andy, as he lived in our building and we socialized in each other's suites. Andy helped tutor Melissa in chemistry and was always around the building offering a joke and a smile.

On behalf of all Sylvan Area Government, we extend our deepest condolences to Andy's family, all of his suite–mates, and to every member of the UMass community as this horrible incident affects us all in different ways.

In a final note to the media and press that have been covering the story: we respect your right to freedom of the press and your right to report what is going on in the world, but please be mindful that all students of Sylvan are already stressed by the presence of midterms which all seem to be scheduled this week.

This incident does not help anyone's academic situation as it is. Thank You.

UPC is not to blame

To the editor:

In response to the accusations of UPC being selfish, of course students are going to get involved in these organizations to get something out of them! It's a great way to learn about an industry that one may hope will lead to a career. Isn't that what most of us are here for? It would be ridiculous for somebody who planned to make a career in the entertainment industry to not get involved in an organization on campus that tailors to that.

Because I have chosen UPC as a means of experience, I have been called everything from stupid to selfish. I also pay that student activities fee that everybody keeps referring to. But unlike many students who are complaining, I take advantage of the opportunities that my activities fee pays for, and I have learned things that are not available in any classroom.

Wouldn't it make more sense to try to change negative things and get involved rather than sit back and complain about it. If you are really so concerned with UPC, where were you when they asked for your input. It was all over campus, posters saying "If you care about Spring Concert, come to this meeting." How many people showed up? Only 10.

Those who sit back and complain won't change a thing, it's those who get out there and try to do something about it who make a world of difference. I respect those students who did attempt to make a difference and help change things. Educate yourself on the situation before you make ill–informed comments.

On a larger scale, ask the Mullins Center how "easy" it has been to secure talent during the spring. I'm sure they'd be more than happy to tell you the "unavailability" of the artist you are asking

Marshals a quirky surprise

By Rob Roensch

U.S. MARSHALS
Directed by Stuart Baird
with Tommy Lee Jones, Wesley Snipes, Robert Downey Jr.
Playing at Hampshire Six Theaters

U.S. Marshals, a spin-off of the solid, middle-of-the-road action-thriller The Fugitive, begins with grainy surveillance camera footage of a shootout in a conveniently murky garage. It's impossible to know exactly what is going on, and that air of mystery and confusion dominates most of the movie.

As in The Fugitive, obsessive Deputy Sam Gerard (Tommy Lee Jones) leads a state-leaping search for an oddly benevolent federal escapee (Wesley Snipes). This time, the innocence of the wanted man is not always clear, so instead of hovering above the story we are forced to walk the trail with Gerard, evaluating clues along with him. The unanswered questions and more jittery, less complacent filming style make U.S. Marshals more vibrant and alive than the removed and mythic Fugitive.

Tommy Lee Jones gives a solid performance in the suspenseful U.S. Marshals.

The soul of U.S. Marshals is the chase, and efforts at characterization are minimal and odd. Gerard's staff gets a little screen time in the beginning of the movie, but its just lip service. Gerard is the whole show, and when he goes after the bad guys all by himself, it's no surprise. The movie attempts also to deepen and humanize Snipes' character by giving him good-girl Irene Jacob for a girlfriend. She's brilliant at the gentle and thoughtful, like in Red, but this movie requires energy and frustration, and she's about as desperate as a cherry tree.

Robert Downey Jr., as a mysterious agent assigned to Gerard's team, and Snipes are both smooth, but both leave oddly unmemorable impressions, as if they decided that the chase was bigger than them. And it is.

The movie is best in the middle section, the pure chase. Director Stuart Baird chops the point-of-view into pieces, neatly capturing the confusion of crowded streets and shoot- outs. The movie hurtles by, fascinating and slightly out-of-control, demanding attention, like a good friend in the car up ahead who's driving too fast.

The beginning and end sections of the movie are awkward by comparison. The marshals fit together like puzzle pieces when they are on the job, but off duty, their interactions seem forced. They resort to dialogue that makes them out to be crabbier than four-year-olds in a crowded supermarket. The movie itches to be back in the grace of the chase, where no one has to worry about conversation.

Tommy Lee Jones, for his part, is effortlessly authoritative as the lead deputy. By the end of the movie, I was willing to lay down in traffic for him. Gerard isn't given much depth, but to add a love interest or a real friend would take away from his single-mindedness.

When the questions are answered and good and evil is clarified, Gerard's devouring obsession to catch the bad guys becomes tragic. In the final scene, Gerard and his underlings mention a lost colleague only briefly, in passing, on their way to a bar. The marshals' attitude and the movie itself both imply that the chase means more than a life or, alternately, that a life is something these obsessive deputies would give up in the battle for justice.

Is this cold-hearted or noble? Either way, the primal force of this chase is hard to argue against. B+

Propellerheads debut a winner; Murphys hit paydirt, Cows don't

COURTESY DANIEL CORRIGAN

The latest offering from the Cows might be the worst album of the year.

DECKSANDRUMSANDROCKANDROLL
Propellerheads
DreamWorks

Taking their name from a Silicon Valley term used to describe a computer nerd, Propellerheads consider themselves an "electronic duo," which may actually not be entirely true.

While Alex Gifford and Will White clearly have an affinity for DJ-created breakbeats and club-based dance music, Propellerheads seem to be shooting for something outside the realm of traditional electronica on Decksandrumsandrockandroll (in stores March 24). An ambitious and daring debut offering, Gifford and White, like Orbital's Hartnoll brothers and the Orb's Dr. Alex Patterson, are sound engineers, making music using a cut-and-splice method to create collages of disparate noises that morph into something altogether hallucinatory. Unlike those two strictly instrumental ensembles, Propellerheads rope in vocalists on a few tracks. The results are sublime.

"360° (Oh Yeah?)" features the rapping prowess of De La Soul is a laid-back funk groove set to the sound of a skateboard going from speaker to speaker, needless to say, it makes for an intriguing aural experience while "History Repeating" showcases the powerful vocals of Miss Shirley Bassey. Singing like she's working in a 20s night club trying to get gentlemen to buy cigarettes and alcohol for their ladies, Bassey turns in a performance that can only be called the electronic age's take on cabaret.

Trax On Trax Off

Not to pigeonhole themselves, "On Her Majesty's Secret Service" has a cinematic quality to it, with atmospheric horns ablaring and harsh noises coming out of the speakers like shrapnel from an explosion.

The real gem here though is "Take California." The Prodigy's "Smack My Bitch Up" without the misogynistic slant. Framed in a sonic backdrop of dizzying scratches and drum 'n bass loops, the lyrical refrain of the song's title is repeated as all hell breaks loose on the dance floor — that's the idea anyway.

Turn to PROPELLERHEADS, page 7

Simply put, Decksandrumsandrockandroll is already a defining moment on 1998's musical map. A (Marty Keane)

SENSELESS SOUNDTRACK
Various Artists
V2 / Dimension

As far as soundtracks go, there's good, tolerable and god awful. This one falls somewhere in between the latter two. It's saving grace from the bottom of all soundtracks can be credited to solid contributions from PM Dawn and The Crystal Method. The rest of the music on the Senseless Soundtrack merely take up space and clutters up the already full world of rap music. It doesn't even have any remotely recognizable songs to look forward to. There are hardly an names to recognize. Most of these guys are just sour average to below average rappers who decided they wanted to be the next Puff Daddy. Needless to say, they don't even come close.

This soundtrack starts off dull and uninteresting with only the Headrilliaz version of "Spacefunk" worthy. At least it broke the monotony. The rest of the CD is just filler, up until "Busy Child" by Crystal Method. These two techno mavens from Las Vegas clearly know what they're doing. Ending with PM Dawn's excellent "Perfect for You," the Senseless Soundtrack rounds out on a high point. At least the editors knew to end on a good note. C– (Gena Mavulli)

FACING THE ANIMAL
Yngwie Malmsteen
Mercury

From the start, it's apparent that both of these men are experienced musicians. Both know the guitar like the backs of their hands, and know what good and bad music is. Their one fault, however, is not knowing what good and bad vocals are. Yngwie Malmsteen and Richie Sambora would be better off singing less and playing more.

Malmsteen makes music that needs to be played loud. It may wake up your whole floor and piss off your roommate, but this CD was never meant to be used as background music. Facing the Animal has a little something about it that makes you want to keep on listening. It's noisy and his voice is sometimes annoying, but oddly enough it still manages to work on many levels. It was a lot of fun. That's his key. Malmsteen keeps variety in his songs which has a way of making you want to hear more. Even the most hesitant of listeners will enjoy this energetic and crazy album.

Richie Sambora on the other hand, needs a clue. He's spent the last 20 or so years playing guitar alongside Bon Jovi. He's toured all over, and has played for millions of people. So, you might think a Sambora solo CD would be a good thing — at the very least, decent. Wrong. Trying to break from the tough-guy guitarist stereotype, Sambora ends up sounding like a sissy.

Undiscovered Soul tries to be more personal and soft. Well, he certainly achieved soft. Mushy is actually more like it. In the slow ballad "Fallen from Gracieland," one can't help but wonder what happened to the guitarist we all knew and loved. He's trying to change it seems, to a type of Bruce Springstein, but he's no where near as good as "The Boss." He's got the talent, just not the voice. If he kept it less sappy, I'd be less inclined to throw out this CD. Facing the Animal— A–, Undiscovered Soul— C– (G.M.)

THE SPOT
The Beatnuts
Relativity

The Spot is an EP featuring all re-mixes of previously released material. By now, there is no doubt as to the Beatnuts' skills in the production room. These kids got skills. Their last album Stone Crazy, was sold on the basis of its beats more then anything else.

So we should all be drooling over a Beatnuts remix EP, right?

Too bad they hardly use their ample talent on this CD. Tracks like "R U. Ready 11," "Get Funky" and "Psycho Dwarf" are phat, but they were also bangin' on The Beatnuts, their first full length, and there isn't that much of a change on this one. Sure there are some differences between these and the originals, but not enough.

They do hit their stride on the re-mix of "Off The Book," and show why they get "Props over Here." "Let Off A Couple" features A.L. and the Rawcotiks; and "Treat$" features Nutgoodus, A.L. and the Rawcotiks. Those are the reasons you should buy this EP. Hey, at least it's not another double album. B (Adam Dlugacz) row and form of the blues, the catharsis of gospel and the free form improvisation of jazz. He tried to take something musical and transform it to something lyrical. What was enjoyed with the ear was translated into something that must be read. He was transcending the medium.

Why do I say all this? To impress my poetry professor? Well... no. I say this because The Cows, on their new album have done close to the same thing. They have taken one sensual experience and allowed us to live it through another sense. They have deftly taken the act of passing a kidney stone and transformed that wonderful feeling into sound. Mmmmhhh... I can almost feel the catheter now.

Sorry In Pig Minor is soooo bad it's the worst thing I've heard in a while. And I hear a lot of bad music. It's art-rock at its worst, with jokiness and pretension taking the place of tune and melody.

Everybody listen well: this is the worst album of the year. I'm placing the bets now. F (Mike Messaros)

THE TROUBLESHOOTERS
Funkdoobiest
Epic

Funkdoobiest is back with their third album, The Troubleshooters, a reference to the effort and problems that went into the production of the record. The trouble was worth it for the most part, because the trio has released an eclectic mix of party jams, street stories and social commentary.

This time out producer/DJ Ralph Mc concentrates more heavily on their Puerto Rican roots, mixing Latin rhythms with a traditional hip-hop sound. MC's Sondoobie and Tomahawk Funk keep up the intensity with their tight, rapid-fire rhymes. Their style is distinctive, though the influence of Cypress Hill is quite apparent. Most effective, though, is the contrast created by the overstated rhymes paired with the smooth, soulful choruses.

At times, Funkdoobiest's delivery becomes grating and obnoxious, and the lyrical content seems limited to party confines, but as the album progresses, they use several tactics to offset these flaws. First is the army of guest MCs. Also, the instrumental "Tribal Flutes" provides a break from the verbal assault, and the political "Five Deadly Indians" adds depth to the album. Thereafter, the party resumes. B+ (Brendan Lynch)

FEAR OF STANDING STILL Coax
Paradigm

What you think of this album depends on what you think of Britpop. Supposedly, some guys from this band were in the "pioneering" English band The Dentists. Hmmmmm... doesn't ring any bells. But if that band sounds anything like Coax, then I have no idea what made them so pioneering.

It's not to say I didn't like this album: I did. It was nice. But it didn't offer me anything. I was deluged by soft, jangly guitar chords and softly plucked strings. This is Brit- pop without any shame.

But after a while, those songs blend into one another. I continued to do my homework while listening to the album on headphones and after a while, the CD was over. It was like the missing minutes on the Nixon tapes; I just couldn't account for them.

The album peaks early, with the first track, "Orchestra." The rest of the album isn't that much worse, but certainly doesn't measure up. That first track is full of beauty and thoughtful lyrics, and everything after that just blends. By the time "Joe Repairs Cars" comes on, you'll wonder where you've been. Unless, of course, you love Britpop. B– (M.M.)

DO OR DIE
Dropkick Murphys
Hellcat

SPLIT 7"
Dropkick Murphys / Anti-heros
TKO

This is the first full-length album from the band that has taken over the Boston punk scene. The Dropkick Murphys have even surpassed the Bruisers as the biggest draw for punk/oi! shows in the Boston area. After releasing a whole slew of 7"s and appearing on numerous compilations, the Dropkicks finally got signed to Hellcat Records, a subsidiary of Epitaph Records, and here is the result. Sixteen tracks that really do a good job of representing the band.

The Dropkicks' main influences are the Clash and Stiff Little Fingers with some "tuffer" oi! influences as well. You get fast-paced, energetic street punk that has come a long way in the band's short career. Mixed in with all these songs of rebellion are more traditional Irish sounding songs. The entire band is made up of Irish-American members, and they seem willing to pay tribute to the men that struggled in Boston as immigrants.

With John from the Big Bad Bollocks helping out on "Far Away Coast," and the band's arrangement of "Tim Finnegan's Wake," it is clear that the band loves its heritage. The real hammers on this album are "Never Alone," "Memories Remain," "Barroom Hero" and the song that closes out this CD and their live set for the past year, "Skinhead on the MBTA."

Well, the real good news here is that the Anti-heros are still alive and writing good music. This double 7" features two songs from each band. For both bands, there is a song released before, and one unreleased song. On the Anti-heros record, there is a live recording of the band's class "Election Day." Snotty. Whiney. complaining punk bands that cry about how oppressive the government is should really take notes on this record. Mark Noah gives you his lyrics in a "call 'em as I see 'em" manner that shows his disapproval of the system without sounding like a whimpering crybaby.

The new headkicker on this record is called "Rich People don't go to Jail." This one keeps my faith in the Anti-heros alive. If you are wondering what this song sounds like, see the comments above. Honest, pure oi! music from Atlanta. The Dropkicks side is nothing to sneeze at either. "Road of the Righteous," which was released on Do or Die, is the first song. It's very Clash influenced, so that means it's good.

The second song, fittingly enough, is a cover of The Clash's "Guns of Brixton." With the exception of the intro, the song is totally different from the original, rocking a lot faster. Definitely a 7" worth getting. Do Or Die— B+, Split 7"— A– (Mikey Melillo)

AUGUSTA BROWN
Augusta Brown
Rasiko

Do you ever wonder where those guys you remember from high school have gone — the guys who took advantage of every talent show and student event to showcase their Eddie Van Halen and C.C. DeVille guitar flashiness? Most of them have musically relocated and can be found behind the deceiving smoke screen of "good-time roots rock," and the three members of Augusta Brown are perfect examples.

On their self-titled and self-released tape, Augusta Brown take you through a six-song wasteland of faux-funk, impotent attempts at Zappa-esque virtuosity, and ridiculously shallow blues riffing. Every chance they get, Augusta Brown like to flash their influences like badges of the machismo musical police force, and as expected, these influences include Hendrix, Zappa and Muddy Waters. Such talent only makes Augusta Brown look all the more shallow and pointless in comparison. F (Michael Telles)

Nomar cements deal with Red Sox

FORT MYERS, Fla. (AP) — AL Rookie of the Year Nomar Garciaparra and the Red Sox agreed yesterday to a landmark $23.25 million, five-year contract that could escalate to $44.25 million if the team exercises two option years.

The deal, unprecedented for a player who has been in the major leagues for little more than a season, came after six weeks of negotiations that began during the NBA All-Star game.

"It's good that things are set," Garciaparra said. "I don't have to worry about anything. I can just play baseball for the next five years."

Garciaparra, who made the minimum $150,000 last season, gets a $2 million signing bonus, $600,000 in 1998, $900,000 in 1999, $3.3 million in 2000, $5.85 million in 2001 and $8.6 million in 2002. Boston has options for $10.5 million in 2003 and $11.5 million in 2004 with a $1 million buyout. If he makes the All-Star team at least four times in the next five years, the options would increase by $500,000 each.

"This is a very rare and talented player. What he's done, few people have ever done their first year in the league," general manager Dan Duquette said. "His best days are ahead of him, and we're glad they're going to be in Boston."

Garciaparra hit .306 with 30 homers, 98 RBIs, 122 runs and 22 steals last season, and was the unanimous choice as AL Rookie of the Year. He set major league records for RBIs by a leadoff hitter and homers by a rookie shortstop.

He also led the majors with 68 multihit games, paced the league with 209 hits and 11 triples, and his 30-game hitting streak broke Guy Curtright's AL rookie record, set in 1943. He broke club records held by Ted Williams, Johnny Pesky and Jim Rice.

"I just want to meet the guy you were talking about," the self-effacing 24-year-old said after Duquette listed his accomplishments. "Wow. I'm very flattered."

Garciaparra's deal dwarfs that of NL Rookie of the Year Scott Rolen, who agreed last week to a $10 million, four-year contract. Garciaparra, whose contract is the longest and by far the biggest for a player with one year of experience, would not have been eligible for free agency until after the 2002 season.

"He's everything that you'd like a ballplayer to be," said Duquette, who has balked at giving even four-year deals to Mo Vaughn and Roger Clemens. "It depends on the player. With the market going up, we thought it would be a good idea to do a long-term deal."

Boston has spent more than $170 million this offseason on salaries, with the biggest deal a $75 million, six-year contract given to NL Cy Young Award winner Pedro Martinez. This season's payroll will be about $50 million.

"I would say it's unprecedented security for a one-plus player," said Garciaparra's agent, Arn Tellem. "It was in both of our interests. Nomar wanted the security and the Red Sox wanted to lock him up for a long time."

Park emerging as one of NL's best

VERO BEACH, Fla. (AP) — Chan Ho Park was a lonely figure as he ran along the outskirts of Dodgertown at 8:45 in the morning. When approached for an interview 2 1/2 hours later, Park politely declined, saying he had more running on his agenda, this time with other Los Angeles Dodger pitchers.

Finally, another 75 minutes after that, Park spared a few minutes before a trip to the weight room.

"Every morning I do 35 minutes by myself — I run my course around Dodgertown," said the 24-year-old Park, who also runs for 30 minutes with his pitching buddies. "I run a lot, it's big for pitching."

Park became one of the National League's better pitchers last season after winning the No. 5 starting job in spring training. The first native-born Korean to pitch in the big leagues, Park was 14-8 with a 3.32 ERA and 166 strikeouts in 192 innings. He began the season with a 5-5 career record and 132 strikeouts in 116 2-3 innings.

Park finished second in the NL with a .213 opponents' batting average, behind Pedro Martinez, who allowed the opposition to hit just .184 while pitching for Montreal.

Park allowed three earned runs or less in 23 of his 29 starts and one earned run or less in 10 starts. The Dodgers were 20-9 when the right-hander started.

"I don't think he has scratched the surface," pitching coach Glenn Gregson said. "The sky's the limit for this guy. His work ethic and everything he does will keep him in a position to excel."

The way Park pitches is reminiscent of the way Hall of Famer Tom Seaver did it — much of the power comes from the upper legs.

"Last year was the first time I pitched so many innings in my life," Park said. "I was tired, not mentally, physically. I tried to work hard during the off-season to be ready.

Men's tennis drops 3

By Sanford Appell
Collegian Staff

The Southern tour for the Massachusetts men's tennis team did not go as well as planned, as the Minutemen dropped all three matches that they played.

As usual, the Minutemen did compete at a high energy level, but were overmatched by three consecutive tough opponents.

UMass fell to Atlantic 10 foe George Washington 6-1 on Saturday afternoon.

Only Parsa Samii was able to come up with a victory, as he won No. 5 singles over Mike Stein 3-6, 6-3, 6-4.

Samii has been a vital part of Massachusetts coach Judy Dixon's team all spring.

"I can't say enough about how well Parsa has played for us lately," Dixon said. "Last year, I was not always sure what to expect from him, but now he is an almost certain winner against another No. 5 player."

Samii was the lone victor earlier this spring against another conference rival Temple.

Todd Cheney, who was battling bronchitis, dropped a three setter against GW, a match Dixon felt Cheney was capable of winning.

"When Todd is healthy, he is a quality No. 1 player," Dixon said. "But when he is ill, it greatly affects his play, and that hurts us as a team."

UMass also fell to Bloomsberg later on Saturday afternoon by the same 6-1 tally.

In this match, No. 2 player Rob Manchester was the winning representative for the Minutemen.

Manchester defeated Rob Dixon 3-6, 6-2, 6-4. Dixon was ranked in the Top 10 for Division II players entering the match.

"This was the biggest win Rob has had personally," Dixon said. "He played one of the best players in the division, and pulled out a three set win. That is tremendous for him."

Manchester has eased into the No. 2 singles spot this spring after going undefeated at No. 3 in the fall.

UMass played and lost to its first Atlantic Coast Conference opponent at Maryland on Sunday afternoon.

Despite another valiant effort, the Minutemen fell 4-2, as the doubles point was not completed.

To maintain the theme of the weekend, Manchester and Samii both won their respective singles matches.

While the doubles competition was not finished, Bo Navarro and Alex Aller did have time to win their No. 2 doubles match 8-6.

"We would have liked that doubles point," Dixon said. "But it was great to see Bo and Alex come together for a victory. Their play will be pivotal for doubles down the stretch."

Impressively, Navarro and Aller came back against opponents they were trounced by at the Cornell Invitational in February.

While the overall results on paper were not positive for UMass, Dixon sees the weekend as part of a learning process.

"I still believe we are capable of playing at that next level up," Dixon said. "We have competed well with tougher opponents this year, even if the scores don't always show it."

The Minutemen will spend the Spring Break training in Florida for the remainder of the week.

UMass will next host Fordham on March 27 at the Upper Boyden courts.

Men's gym downs Pride a second time

By Sanford Appell
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts men's gymnastics team overwhelmed Springfield College for the second consecutive week.

UMass (11-4), triumphed in a four-team meet in Springfield by totaling 228.15 points, easily surpassing Springfield's 207.3 output. Vermont placed third at 186.7, while the Massachusetts Institute of Technology finished with 172.45.

The Minutemen victory was highlighted by another terrific performance from junior Stephen Pryor.

Pryor ended up with four first-place finishes on the afternoon.

The top three overall finishers were all UMass representatives, with Pryor (57.825) leading the way. Sophomore Jeff LeValle finished second with a 56.775 and Freshman Andy Leis added a 55.050 for third place.

Pryor's school-best afternoon included a 9.875 on rings, a 9.750 on high bar, and a 9.600 on parallel bars.

Other first place finishers for UMass were senior Dan Young and freshman Bryan McNulty, who tied for first on floor with a 9.550, and senior Michael Sangiradi on vault with a 9.650.

Freshman such as McNulty and Andy Leis have been major contributors thus far this season.

"I just go out and perform as well I can," McNulty said. "The floor exercise this weekend was a pressure situation. I knew I needed to step up and come out with a really high score."

The Pride, who fell to UMass last week at the Curry Hicks Cage, had several outstanding performances as well.

Springfield captured the four through six overall positions. Sean Reardon was fourth with a 51.65, Jeremy took fifth finishing at 51.65, and James Mlynarski picked up sixth at 51.1.

The Minutemen will next embark on a West Coast swing which kicks off at No. 3 California-Berkley on Friday night.

They will then face Stanford on March 20, before returning home to Amherst where they will host the NCAA East Regionals.

Coppin State denied spot in both hoop tourneys

By Hal Bock
Associated Press

Basketballs are bouncing everywhere right now except at Coppin State, where coach Fang Mitchell wonders about a system that denied him a chance to once again take a bite out of somebody's postseason.

Last year, Mitchell took tiny Coppin State, enrollment 3,200, into the NCAA tournament as a No. 15 seed and sent No. 2 South Carolina from the fancy SEC packing in the first round. The Gamecocks still have scars from that loss, a game that forever will be cited as the reason small conference schools get invited to the tournament.

Coppin followed that stunner with a 21-8 record this season but had the poor judgment to lose the Mid-Eastern Athletic Conference championship game by five points to South Carolina State.

"Bad mistake," Mitchell decided. "We lost with 18 seconds left on a tap-in. You play all year so well and one tap-in at the end of the last game means you're not a quality team."

Because the NCAA's largesse extends just so far, the lone MEAC bid and what is becoming its traditional No. 15 seed went to the conference champs. Mitchell understands that. Surely, though, Coppin's record would earn the Eagles a date in the NIT, which has evolved as the NCAA's consolation tournament.

Guess again.

When the NIT announced its field, Coppin was nowhere to be found. Only four of the 32 NIT teams had as many wins as the Baltimore school. Only four of the 32 had as few losses as Coppin State. Two NIT teams — Florida and Minnesota — lost as many games as they won. Among the invitees was Missouri, a team that Fang's gang beat 78-70 early in the season.

So why is he sitting at home right now? Didn't anybody notice the regular season championship, the 21-8 record, the tough non-conference schedule?

Mitchell thinks he knows what is going on here. Spell it RPI, the power rating that weighs so heavily with the selection committees. Coppin State's was a mediocre 104. Their RPI amounted to an RIP.

"The power rating is nothing more than a means of keeping small conferences down," Mitchell said. "What makes me 155 or 160 to start? What makes No. 1 No. 1 at that time. It's all hypothetical. "If I start at 160 or 150, I can build some points. But eventually I have to play conference games. If the conference is viewed as weak, every time I play a conference team, my RPI goes down."

Sounds a little like Catch-22, doesn't it?

Let Mitchell in a tournament and he makes trouble. Besides beating South Carolina in the NCAA last year, Coppin State beat St. Joseph's on the road in the NIT in 1995.

"Our problem is we upset the apple cart," he said. "We try to win."

Mitchell ticked off the successes of his team.

"We played everybody tough," he said. "We beat Missouri on the road. We played Arizona a 6-point game with 10 minutes left on the road. We played Oklahoma a 3-point game with two minutes left on the road. Connecticut was the only one that blew us out and that was our opener."

The villain here was the conference tournament. Win that last game and Coppin would have been looking for another South Carolina to upset. Because the Eagles lost it, they lost everything. Mitchell has a solution.

"If you don't make the NCAAs after winning the regular season, you ought to be an automatic NIT team," he said.

Flyers in trouble; Phoenix on fire; Nolan still waits

There's plenty of trouble in the air on Broad Street in Philadelphia.

The Flyers are going through a severe state of turmoil right now. Eric Lindros is out of commission for a few weeks after suffering a concussion, and general manager Bobby Clarke demoted head coach Wayne Cashman to an assistant after only a 61 game trial — the shortest stint in Flyers history.

Personally, I just can't fathom a reason why Clarke would throw Cashman in the background in favor of Roger Nielsen. This joker knows nothing about coaching. The Flyers will be his seventh NHL team, and he still hasn't won a Stanley Cup yet.

Michael Kobylanski

Cashman deserved more than this brief stint to prove his worth. Who really cares that this year's edition of the Broad Street Bullies is 4–8 in their last 12. Just look at their record: 32–20–9, good enough for third place in the Eastern Conference. Nielsen probably won't make much of a difference in the City of Brotherly Love. After all, he hasn't really made much of a difference anywhere else he has coached.

The injury to Lindros is obviously a setback for the Flyers at this point, but Philly has a safe hold on the three spot right now, and unless disaster strikes, will be a contender come April.

Oh, and by the way. Daigle's acrobatic goal in overtime against Pittsburgh on Sunday night proved that the Flyers can still win even without Lindros in the lineup.

• Has anyone else noticed the streaking Phoenix Coyotes? The desert nomads who are secluded in the Southwestern heat carry a nine-game unbeaten streak to their credit.

But there's still a comedic aspect to that run: the Coyotes are still three games below the .500 mark at 24–27–12.

Phoenix was a surprise in the West last year, and have a talented nucleus of players in Keith Tkachuk, Jeremy Roenick, Rick Tocchet and Nikolai Khabibulin, who may be one of the best kept secrets in the league, between the pipes.

• How about them Carolina Hurricanes!

No, they didn't get Sergei Fedorov, and yes, the Massachusetts men's basketball team does draw more fans at the Mullins Center than the Hurricanes do in Carolina, but the former Whalers are currently three points out of that final playoff spot in the Eastern Conference.

As a Whalers/Hurricanes fan, I hope that these guys make the playoffs. With all of the problems that have beset the organization off the ice, it would be a nice reward for the players that have had to go through all of this to reach the playoffs.

And who knows, fans might actually go to the games, too.

• Former Buffalo Sabres coach Ted Nolan sits home Lake Erie, Ontario without a job. What a shame.

Nolan was the NHL Coach of the Year a few years back, and possesses a great hockey mind. Clarke should have considered Nolan to replace Cashman. Just think what Nolan could do with players like Lindros, Leclair, Daigle, etc. Look at what he did with the Sabres with "no-names" like Donald Audette, Matthew Barnaby, and some-guy Dominik Hasek: the result was a Northeast Division title.

I like Nolan, primarily because he's a great coach, but secondly because he's a former Whalers assistant. He got the sour end of a deal with the Buffalo ownership, and deserves another opportunity to coach in the NHL. It's just a matter of time before he gets that chance, and the team that claims his services should consider themselves very fortunate.

• New Jersey has quietly cemented its way into the number one seed in the Eastern Conference. They lead Philly by 12 points for first place in the Atlantic Division, and Pittsburgh by seven points for the overall lead.

Don't expect the Devils to fold any time soon either. Even with the meager offense that they supply, Martin Brodeur can win games single-handedly. He is among the world's elite, and New Jersey knows it.

UM's Janowicz drops nickel on Hawks

The Massachusetts men's lacrosse team didn't rest on its laurels following yesterday's win over Hartford for very long.

In fact, by the time UMass coach Greg Cannella had corralled his team into the locker room after the Minutemen's 18–7 win, the team's collective mind was focused on what is yet to come.

Massachusetts 18
Hartford 7

But before the Minutemen could concentrate on this weekend's matchup against Virginia (Saturday, noon at Richard F. Garber Field), they first had to deal with the visiting Hawks.

Take care they did, running out to a lead as large as 17–3 and holding Hartford's attack scoreless for a stretch of 31:08.

But UMass' focus was also on its own offensive production. The Minutemen, who have turned in a slow point-production effort in the third quarter of their game against Fairfield last Saturday, exploded for six goals out of the intermission, a fact that pleased Cannella.

"I'm happy with the way we played in the third quarter," Cannella said. "When we played our scrimmages this year we didn't always play hard in the second half. We didn't play particularly well in the third quarter in the last game either."

Cannella saw improvement in an area of primary concerns after the Fairfield game, penalties. Against the Stags, the UMass man-down unit racked up more time than Cannella would have preferred. Yesterday against the Hawks the Minutemen only saw four flags for 2:30 in penalties.

"We did a better job today," Cannella said. "We were more selective on breaks, we moved the ball around more, we handled the ball well on the perimeter."

The Minutemen also moved the ball well in the box, where they formulated successful attacks on Hartford goalie Paul Caracci, who finished with 11 saves in the complete game effort.

Mike Janowicz was his usual self, scoring five goals for the third consecutive game (in only his third start). Janowicz has now found net on 15 of his 22 shots on the season.

Like Janowicz, senior captain Mike DelPercio had a strong day as well, pocketing a hat trick. He now has eight scores for the season.

Despite its low output it was Hartford that opened the day's scoring. Ron Nader tallied his first of four on the day off an assist from Keith Anzekone to beat Minuteman netminder John Kasselakis, who totalled seven saves.

UMass then put together its first successful offensive strike when DelPercio fired a hard shot past Caracci. Janowicz got on the board with his first 11 seconds after his teammate. David Kramer won the post-goal faceoff, raced upfield and dished off to Janowicz, who one-timed the ball into the Hawk net.

With the exception of a Hartford goal from Todd Richard, the rest of the first quarter was all Janowicz. The sophomore scored UMass' next three to push the Minutemen into the second quarter.

Freshman Jeremy Guski notched his first collegiate goal with 11:09 remaining before halftime to stretch the UMass lead to 6–2. Alex Raciopii recorded his second career goal on an unassisted tally under a minute after Guski struck. Jay Negus connected on a Janowicz feed to close the first half's scoring.

In the second half, senior Chris Martens locked up a two- goal day with a pair of strikes, and Mike Young and John Madigan joined DelPercio and Janowicz as scorers. John O'Connor and DelPercio found the net in the fourth.

"It was great to see a lot of the players out there today," said Cannella, who was afforded the opportunity to play several younger players for significant time. "They deserve it."

Women's lacrosse hopes solid mix equals success

By Jorma Kansanen
Collegian Staff

When compared to the upcoming Massachusetts women's lacrosse team's 1998 season, legendary bluesman Robert Johnson's dilemma at the crossroads in Rosedale might not be so bad.

After graduating her first recruiting class, coach Francesca McClellan's program is now at the junction separating the roads headed to either national prominence or also-ran status.

Rosedale and Amherst — just one interesting metaphor amidst a series of intriguing scenarios facing the Minutewomen this spring.

Just to start with, the team lost the foursome which laid the foundation for UMass in its first four years of full Division I competition. The leadership of the Ridley, Pa. trio of Erica Bryan, Kristen Hocker and Michele Warrington combined with the offensive skill of Stephanie Walsh will be missed.

However, add the return of nine starters and the possible impact of a stellar freshman class to the mix, and the sting of the loss of the seniors is soothed quite nicely. With that in mind, if the 1998 season was a Gen-Ed requirement, it would be called Lax Psych 101 (Post-Ridley Consciousness), or even more historically direct: Year 1, A.R. (After Ridley).

The Ridley High trio brought a high skill level from the hotbed of lacrosse, and Walsh brought an uncompromising desire to score goals, but to single out those four players from last year's team would be uncouth and unjust. The Minutewomen had their best season in 10 years, falling just one game below .500 with a 6–7 record, while playing a schedule filled with nationally ranked teams.

For McClellan, those four seniors set the base for the program to build off of for the future.

"Our Ridley kids plus Walsh gave the program so much, and the program was really able to count on them," McClellan said. "They're ability to bring the program up a level was tremendous. I think we burnt them out, but really, their time came and their time was done, and that has allowed us to step up to the next level.

"They did their tour of duty, so to speak, and they were the foundation in setting standards as far as work ethic and commitment to the program. The younger kids fed off of that, and they're ready to step up to the next level this year."

With the loss of Bryan and Hocker on defense, a Northeast Regional All-American in sophomore Lynne Young fills that hole admirably. Young came off of her 1996 All-American selection for Saratoga Catholic in Saratoga Springs, N.Y. to be the only freshman last season to start all 13 games.

Speaking of defense, UMass had to rely on an inexperienced, yet hard working, field player-turned-goalkeeper last season in Megan Haggerty. This season, the team has two top notch freshman to compete for the starting job in Tara Durkin and Jen Nardi.

Durkin was a two-time All-Philadelphia selection at Jenkintown, Pa. High School, helping lead her team to a 52- 9–3 record over her four-year career. On the other hand, Nardi captained her Nyack, N.Y. team to the Section I Championship last season while garnering an honorable mention All-American selection at the same time.

McClellan's philosophy about her goaltenders going into this spring is definitely "two for me," and hopefully, not as many goals for the opposition.

"With our two freshman goalies, it's like apples and oranges as far as their styles, and what they bring to the cage," McClellan said. "It's very exciting to have both of them behind us. Last year, we had bad goalie karma.

"But I have to say, Megan Haggerty did an unbelievable job for the position we put her in."

Losing a perennial Northeast Region All-American selection in Warrington is tough for the Minutewoman midfield, but the team returns a deep lineup of players that will all challenge for playing time.

The UMass midfield is led by two members of the senior tri-captaincy, the gritty Amy Leder, who ranked second on the team last season in ground balls with 64, and the speedy Jen Herker, who was the team's fourth leading scorer with 11 goals and seven assists. The key for the Minutewomen will be junior Melissa Anderson, who will return to the center position where she started 11 games last season.

Throw into the mix sophomore Rebecca Minaker ('97: 16g, 6a), who exploded onto the scene as a walk-on last season, and Stephanie Pavlick and Sara MacNabb, and midfield depth will be the strength of the Minutewoman squad going into this season.

"We have some real toughness in the midfield with Amy Leder and Melissa Anderson," McClellan said. "Jen Herker has been working at full speed, and Steph Pavlick has come back new and improved."

Two strong players return to the UMass attack this season, and the addition of a star recruit bolsters a potentially high scoring unit. Last season's leading scorer, junior Laura Korutz ('97: 26g, 15a), will join up with the team's setup artist, senior tri-captain Jen Bowen once again, and 5-foot- 11 freshman Fay Naber has stood out among a solid freshman recruiting class.

Bowen ('97: 9g, 9a) and Korutz both had to deal with a string of nagging injuries last season, but a healthy tri- captain combined with Korutz, who scored 22 points in the last five games last season, and an All-American for Suffern (N.Y.) High in Naber (career: 188 goals, 56 assists) provides a potentially strong offensive unit for the Minutewomen.

"Laura Korutz has been looking the best we've ever seen her look, and that is real good for us because she's been struggling with some back injuries the past couple of years," McClellan said. "Jen Bowen has been contributing her steady leadership as always, and with the newcomers, Fay Naber is becoming a stunning attacker.

"On attack, she can put the ball in the cage from just about anywhere. We're really excited about her."

To be the best you have to play the best, and the same holds true with this season's schedule for UMass. After a successful fall training season, and two weekends of spring scrimmages, the Minutewomen are more prepared than any other season.

The Ivy League is once again well represented, with home games against perennial nationally ranked teams like Harvard (March 14), Brown (April 1), Dartmouth (April 8) and a road game against Yale on March 25. But, the biggest home game of the season will be against Temple, and last season's Final Four participant will hit Totman Field on March 28.

"Last season and this season's schedule are similar, but the changes in our lineup are monumental," McClellan said. "We have stronger people in all areas of the field. So, the possibilities for variety in our lineup are very exciting. Player for player, we're a stronger team."

South African budget limits spending

CAPE TOWN, South Africa (AP) — Trying to keep down costs and create jobs simultaneously, South Africa unveiled a budget yesterday that sticks to tight spending limits while establishing a fund for job-generating projects.

Finance Minister Trevor Manuel, mindful of national elections a little more than a year away, has been under pressure from the governing African National Congress' left-wing allies to raise money for jobs and welfare by increasing taxes on the rich. He shied away from that, however, and instead recommended a one-time 2.5 percent tax on the cash reserves of two insurance giants, Old Mutual and Sanlam, which plan to issue shares to policy-holders and become public companies.

Manuel said the tax could raise $250 million to $550 million, which would create a fund to sponsor job-creation projects — especially among the ANC's core supporters in the black community. The government estimates South Africa's unemployment rate at from 29 percent to 34 percent, but some private economists say it runs as high as 40 percent.

Since his appointment in 1996, Manuel has won over financial markets with his investor-friendly policies and commitment to strict spending limits.

Promise Keepers seeks donations for payroll

PORTLAND, Ore. (AP) — The founder of Promise Keepers, the Christian ministry that rallied a half-million men to the nation's capital last year, is asking ministers from Oregon and Washington to contribute $1,000 each to help pay its staff.

Both men and women were among the 3,000 clergy that attended a conference at Bible Temple Church here Tuesday.

The ministry, which urges men to take more responsibility as husbands and fathers, has drawn criticism for restricting its gatherings to men.

Former University of Colorado football coach Bill McCartney, the group's founder, said donations will allow more men to come and be converted.

"This is about the father's heart. There isn't a father who doesn't want to see his sons come together," he said.

Last month, McCartney said all 345 paid employees worldwide would be laid off and the organization would rely on volunteers unless donations could cover the costs.

The Denver-based ministry has attracted more than 2.7 million men to its events across the country since its founding in 1990. Promise Keepers' revenue grew from $4 million in 1993 to $87 million in 1996. Last year, its budget was $70 million. But now it is nearly bankrupt after October's massive "Stand in the Gap" event in Washington, D.C., which drew 500,000 men.

Ratification postponed

By Jill Carroll
Collegian Staff

Despite not being able to ratify Tuesday's election results, the University of Massachusetts Student Government Association (SGA) in a unique show of efficiency passed six motions to benefit students last night. However, the meeting also rendered the judicial arm of the senate incapacitated.

Chancellor for Elections Carlos Alvarez appeared at the meeting but did not give an official report on the elections, which is required before the senate can ratify the elections.

Speaker of the Senate Peter Kilbourne explained the problem created by Alvarez not giving an elections report last night.

"If Carlos submits it [elections report] tomorrow, the earliest elections could be held is in May," Kilbourne said. "I have serious issues with the elections."

Alvarez delayed his report in an attempt to prevent the senate from annulling the elections.

"My purpose is to avoid annulling the elections. If these elections are not ratified there will not be new elections until next year," Alvarez said.

The senate will vote whether to ratify or annul the elections at the next meeting on March 25.

Despite this debate the senate was efficient and productive by passing six motions to benefit students. Two motions passed concerning the UCard, the University student ID.

Senator Jennifer Casasanto (Southwest at-large), proposed a motion to enable students to present other forms of identification at the Dining Commons for a limited amount of meals to allow a student time to find a lost UCard.

"The policy last year was if you could do it [eat at the Dining Commons] nine times without your ID. Ever since we got the UCard you have to use your UCard," Casasanto said.

Casasanto also felt because students pay for meals ahead of time they should be able to use them without a UCard.

"You shouldn't be denied meals because you misplaced your UCard. The administration does things that are convenient for them and harder for us," Casasanto said.

Although the motion passed, Senator Paul Ferro (Commuter at-large) challenged it because he felt allowing students to use other forms of ID to get meals was permitting students to be irresponsible.

"I don't think it's a lot to ask a college age student to keep an ID in their

Jury could hear Clinton testimony

By John Solomon
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Monica Lewinsky's lawyer, saying her legal bills likely exceed $100,000, welcomed the possibility yesterday that President Clinton might testify before the federal grand jury investigating the president-intern controversy.

"We welcome the truth, and we would do anything to get this over," attorney William Ginsburg said of reports that Clinton's advisers and Whitewater prosecutors have had preliminary talks about a possible presidential grand jury appearance.

Ginsburg, however, said in an interview he cannot project when his own client might testify, as he and Independent Counsel Kenneth Starr continue to battle in court over whether she should be given full immunity in exchange for testimony.

Meanwhile, the grand jury investigating whether Ms. Lewinsky had a sexual relationship with the president and then tried to cover it up with Clinton's help appeared to spend yesterday reviewing evidence.

Clinton's personal secretary, Betty Currie, was scheduled to testify but that appearance was delayed until next week, officials said.

One of the president's most trusted advisers, Bruce Lindsey, is expected to make a return appearance today in what could precipitate a major showdown over executive privilege.

In his first appearance before the grand jury last month, Lindsey declined to answer several prosecutors' questions on grounds his answers might violate the president's right to executive privilege, sources said.

Since then, prosecutors and the White House have tried to avert a showdown over the issue, but officials have said those talks have made little or no progress.

Ginsburg has argued that prosecutors made but then rescinded a deal to give his client full immunity in exchange for her cooperation. They deny it. Both sides spent an entire day in court last week arguing their cases in secret before the chief judge overseeing the grand jury.

"There's all sorts of things hanging it up," Ginsburg said. Asked if could win full immunity for his client, Ginsburg said he remains concerned about his prospects.

"A trial lawyer always run scared... so I feel no confidence, no high level of elation. I feel concerned," he said. "I always feel I have the ability to win because I have the facts and the law on my side. But that doesn't mean I'm not scared."

Ginsburg said Ms. Lewinsky, 24, a former White House intern, is sometimes depressed by her plight, feeling trapped most times in her Watergate apartment by an intense news media following. "She goes from being happy when we are out and having a good time to normally human-type depression when she is not be able to go out and call her friends," he said.

UM, AC crime rose over year

By Samantha Poulten
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts and Amherst College have had a significant increase in student crime since last year with numerous arrests on the UMass campus, as well as five student arrests at Amherst College since the fall semester.

In comparison, last year there were no arrests made on the Amherst College campus. This year, charges have ranged from trespassing to marijuana possession.

Ed Zaniewski, acting chief of the Amherst College Police Department, said that this year crime on campus has been relatively high. However, the college is doing everything it can to relay the message that the campus is still safe for students.

"We are trying to increase awareness around campus," Zaniewski said.

According to Zaniewski, an Amherst College student recently reported almost being struck by a car while trying to cross Route 9. The student reported that the car veered toward him intentionally when he or she saw a pedestrian crossing the street.

There were also two reports of suspicious cars reported in late January and February at the University of Massachusetts.

In January, a female student reported that she was accosted and assaulted by three men in a vehicle near University Drive. No one was arrested for the incident, but UMass police informed other departments in the Five College

WASHINGTON — A federal judge ordered Iran to pay $247.5 million in damages to the family of an American woman killed in a suicide bombing in Gaza in 1995. "The court is seeking to deter further terrorist actions," said District Court Judge Royce Lamberth.

The ruling yesterday was the first under a new law allowing Americans to sue nations believed to sponsor terrorism for damages caused by such attacks. While the victim's family is unlikely to collect the damage award any time soon, the ruling could complicate tentative efforts to improve relations between the United States and Iran.

"Terrorists and the countries which sponsor them should know that we will continue to increase the price to be paid for acts of terrorism," declared Rep. Jim Saxton, (R-N.J.), who heads the House Task Force on Terrorism. "This decision clearly shows that we will ... hit them hard in the wallet as well."

Iran vehemently denies it has any connections to terrorist groups or attacks. Although Lamberth said Iranian representatives had been invited to testify at court hearings on March 3-4, a spokesman for the Iranian mission to the United Nations said yesterday he was not aware of the court case in Washington. The two countries have been bitter foes since the 1979 ouster of Shah Reza Mohammed Pahlavi and the taking of U.S. hostages. But since the election last year of a moderate cleric as president of Iran, there have been signs of a possible thaw and re-establishment of cultural and other ties.

pocket," Ferro said.

Another motion brought by Cassanto entailed raising the quality and lowering the price of the UCard itself.

"The meal plan office said it [UCard] does not cost $15 to replace an ID," Cassanto said of the charge applied to students for replacement cards.

"I don't see how these IDs are going to last four years for any of us because they are cracking horizontally," Cassanto said. "If it cracks vertically you pay for it. If it cracks horizontally you don't."

Cassanto's motion passed unanimously.

Senator Stephen Johnson (Commuter at-large) proposed a motion to have students' positive achievements listed on transcripts.

"You get something bad in your transcript they show it, but something good like Dean's list they don't," Johnson said.

The motion was passed without debate.

After completion of business, the relatively peaceful meeting ended with a great deal of conflict.

The senate Judicial branch was incapacitated last night as senators would not permit a motion to appoint a member to the judiciary in order to have quorum, to the agenda.

"[An effective senate] is having to go after and effective judiciary. [Without this appointment] there is not even a Judicial branch," Senator Brenda Fitzpatrick, (Commuter at-large) said.

Despite Fitzpatrick's plea, many senators did not want the motion even to be placed on the agenda which would allow it to be voted on.

Kilbourne criticized the people who voted against or abstained, which resulted incapacitating the judicial branch.

"I want to publicly chastise all of you who voted against this. [To the] people who abstained, that is spineless. It is spineless and cowardly," Kilbourne said.

Johnson also spoke out against abstainers and "nay" voters.

Justice opposes moving more lawyers to states

By Cassandra Burrell
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The Justice Department doesn't want to see its 2,600-strong army of Washington-based lawyers reduced, a top official told the House Judiciary Committee yesterday.

As Congress begins its first detailed review of the department since 1979, Deputy Attorney General Eric Holder said Justice officials and committee members mostly agree on how it should operate in the future.

There's one area where they disagree, however — a plan to move 200 litigators out of Washington and add them to the staffs of federal prosecutors in the states.

A measure included in a bill by the committee chairman, Rep. Henry Hyde, (R-Ill.), and Rep. John Conyers of Michigan, the committee's senior Democrat, calls for moving 200 Washington-based antitrust, civil, civil rights, criminal, environmental and tax lawyers to the staffs of the 94 U.S. attorneys' offices.

Those offices, manned by about 4,800 attorneys, handle federal prosecutions in the states. The attorney general would choose which lawyers to move.

"We view this proposed change as weakening the department's six litigating divisions and the critical functions they serve, and, therefore, we oppose it," Holder said.

Hyde said the move would increase productivity by allocating more resources to the U.S. attorneys, which handle the bulk of federal prosecutions.

"It would put 200 more assistant U.S. attorneys on the front lines, where they can do the most good," Hyde said. "The rationale behind this provision is very simple. Trying to litigate a case from Washington is like being a ballplayer who's playing an away game. You are always at a disadvantage when you are playing on someone else's turf."

But Holder said Washington-based lawyers are specialists in their fields

Ron Carey implicated in fund scheme

By Kevin Galvin
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Beleaguered Teamsters President Ron Carey's former campaign manager publicly implicated him in an illegal fund-raising scheme for the first time yesterday but conceded Carey was told little about the plan.

An attorney for Carey sought to portray Jere Nash, the ex-campaign manager, as a profiteer who quick-talked Carey into agreeing to make union donations to third parties that generated contributions to Carey's 1996 re-election coffers.

Nash told a court-appointed Independent Review Board that Carey reversed a decision to deny a contribution to Citizen Action after he was told that the payment would help his campaign effort. "I said it will help Martin Davis to raise money for the campaign," Nash said, recounting his conversation with Carey. Carey's response, he said, was to approve the donation with the comment: "Well, hell — no one ever told me about it."

The Teamsters gave $475,000 to Citizen Action in October of 1996, and supporters of the liberal consumer group agreed to contribute to help Carey in his tight race with James P. Hoffa. Nash said the conversation with Carey may have lasted only 15 seconds, and he said they never discussed subsequent payments linking Project Vote '96 and the National Council of Senior Citizens to the scheme.

More than $800,000 in union funds were used to generate contributions to Carey's coffers just before the December 1996 vote. Carey's election was overturned and he was barred from a rerun. He has taken a leave of absence from the union, and the Independent Review Board could expel him.

Mark Hulkower, a union attorney, suggested even if Carey's conversation with Carey had gone as Nash described it, it was plausible that Carey didn't fully understand Nash's intention. Nash conceded he never directly described a grand pro quo or suggested that what he was discussing constituted illegal use of union money.

Nash, Davis and a third consultant pleaded guilty in September 1997 to perpetrating the scheme, and all three have been cooperating with federal prosecutors in New York. The prosecutors barred Nash from answering questions related to Davis' efforts to establish a similar contribution-swap with Democratic officials or to raise money from other labor unions.

Nash testified that at Davis' behest he coordinated closely with William Hamilton, Teamsters director of government affairs who took donation requests to Carey.

President Clinton greeted Mohammad Khatami's election as a "hopeful sign" but demanded that Tehran renounce terrorism and endorse the Israeli-Arab peace process. The ruling, made under the Antiterrorism Act of 1996, would award the money to the family of Alisa Flatow, 20, of West Orange, N.J., who was student at a seminary in Jerusalem when she was killed in an attack on a bus in Gaza City on April 9, 1995. Seven Israeli soldiers also died in the attack for which Islamic Jihad claimed responsibility.

The judge agreed with the Flatow family that Islamic Jihad is backed by Iran's Islamic government and that Iran therefore is responsible for her death.

"The lunatics who planted the bomb and drove the van that killed Alisa were not acting alone," said Stephen Flatlow, the student's father. "A state sponsor of terrorism such as the Islamic Republic of Iran has to be held to account."

But Lamberth did not specify how the award was to be collected. Flatlow family lawyers said they plan to go after Iranian assets in the United States and elsewhere.

The United States froze Iranian assets valued at $12 billion in 1979. Most of the funds, however, are controlled by the Iran-United States Claims Tribunal in The Hague, Netherlands, a group of nine judges who decide claims against both Iran and the United States. The United States itself has jurisdiction over only a fraction of the assets, mostly real estate.

Two years ago, the United States agreed to pay $131.8 million in a settlement to families of Iranians killed on a civilian airliner shot down by the U.S. Navy in 1988. All 290 passengers aboard that flight were killed.

Steven Perles, a lawyer for the Flatlow family, said the money could either come from the frozen funds or from Iranian assets in other nations that have arrangements with the United States to recognize rulings by each other's courts.

"Iran is a wealthy country with lots of assets, and when you have assets, you have targets," Perles said. "Wherever we can find them, we can go and ask the authorities to attach them on the basis of a binding judgment by a U.S. court."

In Gaza City, a spokesman for Islamic Jihad dismissed the ruling and denied the movement is funded by Iran or any other country. "This is a big joke, because thousands of Palestinians have been killed during the past 50 years without anyone caring about them or about their family," said Mohammed Said, a leader of the group.

Similar lawsuits are pending against the Libyan government, its intelligence agency and two of its intelligence officers as a result of the 1988 bombing of Pan Am Flight 103 over Lockerbie, Scotland, that killed 270 people.

"Part of what we're trying to do by law was to impose a severe penalty on countries that would engage in this kind of thing, and immediately Pan Am 103 springs to mind," said Sen. Frank

Clinton plan could raise interest rates

By Libby Quaid
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Lawmakers are promising to kill a Clinton administration proposal to increase interest rates on government loans to disaster victims.

"Over my dead body," Rep. Jim Talent, chairman of the House Small Business Committee, told officials of the Small Business Administration.

"It's a dagger in the heart of these disaster victims. It's a demoralizing and discouraging message to be sending to people." The idea met with disgust from the appropriations panel, with authority over SBA finances. Its chairman, Rep. Harold Rogers, (R-Ky.), cut short a hearing by ordering agency officials not to return without ditching the proposal to raise the cap on interest rates from 4 percent to 6 percent.

The same frosty reception awaits the plan next week from Sen. Christopher Bond, (R-Mo.), who heads the Senate panel on small business.

"I can assure you, this one is going to have to be passed over my strenuous opposition," Bond said Tuesday. "We've had our share of disasters, and we know disaster loans go to the most needy victims. It's really their last hope."

This is the fifth year the Small Business Administration proposed the idea of a rate increase. Without it, SBA officials estimate they will need $125 million more from Congress. Talent, also a Missouri Republican, said the proposal masks a $200 million increase in the agency's cost.

The agency argues the current low rate encourages people not to insure homes and businesses. Raising the cap would boost interest rates from an estimated 3.6 to 5.5 percent. SBA says the average homeowner's monthly loan payment would rise from $103 to $122, while businesses would pay $374 each month, up from the current $324.

"It would be an increase, there's no doubt about that, but it would still be less than what the government is paying," said Bernard Kulik, the agency's associate administrator for disaster assistance. "Every dollar we lend out adds to the deficit. This operates as a disincentive to people to protect themselves." Furthermore, the cap on interest rates has been unchanged since 1984, Kulik said. The 45-year-old disaster loan program last year made 49,515 loans at a total cost of $1.1 billion.

Children want dog home

ANCHORAGE, Alaska (AP) — Balto, come home.

Alaska schoolchildren are petitioning a Cleveland museum to return the stuffed remains of Balto, the sled dog that led the last leg of a heroic, 1925 relay to bring lifesaving diphtheria serum to Nome.

But officials at the Cleveland Museum of Natural History are adamant.

"The dog is not going to be returned," director James King said yesterday.

Nome was in the throes of a deadly epidemic at the time of the dogsled relay, and Balto was hailed as a hero. The run later became the inspiration for the Anchorage-to-Nome Iditarod Trail Sled Dog Race.

The stuffed dog has resided at the museum since in the 1930s. Youngsters at Butte elementary school north of Anchorage have launched a drive to bring him home. The second- and third-graders have written letters to Alaska Gov. Tony Knowles and local legislators and are drafting a plea to the museum.

"People in Cleveland have done real well by this dog. But it'd be nice to have him back home," said Dwight Homstad, a second-grade teacher.

While Balto's roots are in Alaska, the dog has strong connections to Ohio.

It was schoolchildren in Cleveland who helped raised money to rescue a live Balto and his six teammates from a California man who was exhibiting them in a "dime-a-look" museum.

area to be on the lookout for suspicious cars.

Two 18-year-old males were arrested at a University of Massachusetts parking lot in February. The two were charged with trying to break into cars around the campus.

There have been arrests made on the Amherst College campus for breaking and entering into the dorms and into campus buildings. According to Zaniewski, arrests have also been made for trespassing and marijuana possession.

Zaniewski said memos were issued to all students about each incident on campus, and that the students should take special precautions to try to prevent them from happening again.

"We've installed electronic access systems in all 31 residence halls on campus," Zaniewski said. "They will now be locked 24 hours a day."

This system is much like the pilot program implemented this semester in the residence halls at UMass.

UMass police have also offered numerous warnings to students saying that students should exercise caution while walking on campus late at night.

"Students should take precaution and walk in groups and utilize the escort service," UMass Chief of Police John Luippold said.

FAA reports strong sales in aviation

By Glen Johnson
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The aviation industry posted its fourth consecutive strong year in 1997 and is expected to grow domestically 3.5 percent annually over the next 12 years, the FAA said in a report being released today.

The projected growth, the result of such factors as an increase in the number of senior citizens and passengers in Asia, is good news for airlines, aircraft makers and other related businesses. It could be tempered if the current economic problems in Asia last more than two years, or if there is a spike in world fuel prices. Transportation Secretary Rodney Slater and FAA Administrator Jane Garvey were scheduled to discuss details of the report at the kickoff of the Federal Aviation Administration's 23rd annual Commercial Aviation Forecast Conference here.

According to the report, domestic boardings by paying passengers increased by 3.4 percent last year, from 524.5 million in 1996 to 542.3 million in 1997. International boardings increased 4.2 percent, from 50.3 million to 52.5 million.

With more passengers, the airline industry reported a sizable increase in operating profits, up $1.9 billion in 1997 to $7.9 billion total. In 1993, industry operating profits were closer to $300 million.

FAA officials said the traffic increase was primarily spurred by the solid U.S. and world economies. As more people fly, that spurs orders for new aircraft and related services.

The report projected the U.S. air carrier jet fleet will increase from 4,953 planes last year to 7,419 in 2009, an annual increase of 3.4 percent.

Over that same span, the FAA is expecting steady passenger growth. As the number of senior citizens grows, they are expected to travel more since they have the time and disposable income. The total number of passengers flown to and from the United States is forecast to nearly double over the next 12 years, from 109.8 million this year to 204.4 million in 2009.

The number of Atlantic-route passengers, currently the biggest block of travelers to and from the United States, is expected to increase roughly 4.6 percent annually over the next 12 years to 73.8 million total in 2009. That number, however, is expected to be over taken by passengers on Latin American routes during that same period.

One year later

Joe Sullivan

It's one year after the Goodell Takeover, and very little has been said about it. Are we ashamed that such an event had to occur? Is the administration trying to make us forget it? Or is it not as important as it seemed while it was happening? At the end of last year, I remember someone asking me and several other students what the year was defined by, and we all agreed it was Goodell. What happened to it, and why am I making such a big deal out of it?

Goodell is, was, and will be one of the most important events to happen in the history of this University for three important reasons: a sense of community created (finally), collaboration among diverse groups of people, and what appeared at the time to be a break from the unfair practices enacted by the administration upon everyone under them. None of these three elements have come together in the same way since.

UMass Amherst is the largest school in the state and one of the largest in the country, and there are hundreds of separate communities on its campus, many of which rarely get an opportunity to interact. This lack of interaction may also be extended to include the Five College community. Here, on an individual level, a student is likely to experience a feeling of not belonging, an anonymity that results simply from the sheer size of the University. For those who participated in last March's six days of civil disobedience, Goodell erased all of this.

Students, graduate and undergraduate, flocked to the old library, not only from this campus, but from each of the other four colleges in the area, from Springfield, from Boston, from other schools in the UMass system and from out of state. A select number of faculty and staff members also got involved. At its height, Goodell was attended by hundreds, clapping and rallying around the cry of "The students, united, will never be defeated," and no one was ashamed or felt alienated. Everyone was poised towards the same goal.

The fact that the feeling of community created by Goodell was made up of so many different kinds of people attests to the greatness of the event as well. Although the takeover was advertised as ALANA students fighting for rights denied since 1992, the makeup of Goodell's participants was not restricted to UMass' minority communities. Goodell was inhabited for six days by about 200 students of every racial and ethnic background. People of various religious backgrounds, people of every sexual orientation, individuals with disabilities and those representing various political and social groups all took part. An Indian Chief and a member of his Connecticut tribe were there to check on a fellow tribe member who was inside. Afterward, they sang and played percussion as the diverse crowd outside took part in an impromptu pow wow. There were socialists from Boston setting up tables and promoting reading materials that spoke of a better way. Cornell West called. These and other diverse sources promoted rights for everyone.

Most importantly, the promise of Goodell was that there would be better overall treatment for all people on this campus. Central to this idea was the expectation that dealing with Whitmore, especially Financial Aid, would no longer be comparable to getting kicked in the head. It was the promise that the climate of the campus would improve. To carry this out, 21 "agreements" were negotiated between the student negotiators and the administration.

The resilient student community created by Goodell seems to have remained intact, but where is the promise today? With the way things have gone this year thus far, it appears that the ideal created by Goodell has been flushed down the toilet.

The week before school began in September, every student received a copy of the University Picketing Code — an instantaneous rebirth of the cycle of administrative intimidation. The administration has attempted to pinpoint alcohol as the root cause of most problems on campus, never once considering it as a consequence of the system they maintain. The Graduate Employee Organization (GEO) was finally allowed mediation in their contract negotiations, but not before being driven to the edge of striking. Students are still being treated inhumanely by Whitmore and are dissatisfied — check any of the recent campus surveys. The demands of Goodell have not wholly been met, including childcare and new academic departments. Finally, the point must be made that the whole negotiation process resulting from the takeover was broken off earlier this year, brought on by student negotiators' frustration with the administrative team's inability to even understand the concept of positive change.

The analysis of what has transpired this year can be summed up as: one year after Goodell, climate issues on this campus are still not being addressed properly. Unfortunately, things are the same as or worse than before the takeover.

Soapbox, anyone?

Julie Fialkow

Doesn't it seem like the people that talk the most about something actually know the least about it? We've all been known to spout off about nothing, just to hear the beauty of our own voices. But I'm talking about perpetual abusers; people that should give off a blinking warning light every time they open their mouths. These voice-box abusers come in all shapes and sizes.

There's your buddy, "Fred", who constantly gives you advice on how to Mac the opposite sex. He tells you things like, "Listen, if you want to attract the guys, you gotta make sure you talk about all your ex-boyfriends and your menstrual cycle. They'll be drooling over you, babe!"

"Hey, man," Fred oozes authoritatively, "Ya wanna know my secrets that get the ladies. Meow! Talk about yourself constantly and stare at her chest. Trust me, that!"

Then one day, after being slapped and rejected so many times you feel like Steve Urkel on a losing streak, you realize Fred has only been out with one girl in his life — and they were related! Fred, the "Mac Daddy of love," turns out to put the "L" in loser, not in love.

Another person afflicted with this disease is your classmate "Sally." Sally sits up in the first row of all her classes. If all the seats are filled up there, she'll pull a desk up from the back, just so she can be right underneath the professor's nose.

Everyone looks bewildered when the teacher asks what caused the French Revolution except, of course, Sally.

"The French Revolution was caused by France's unequivocal desire for a land entrenched in 'Je-ne-sais-quoi' that eventually led to an upheaval of fear-inducing machismo, which forever affected the moral convictions of the citizens in this patriarchal country."

Everyone in the class stares at Sally in confusion and anger. They either think she's an annoying windbag, or a genius. The professor always is tactful and euphemistic towards Sally. She/he has memorized the part in the "Professor's Handbook" about how to say "you're full of crap" in a tactful, professional manner. But Sally continues to answer every question regardless of her obvious lack of knowledge about anything besides booty kissing.

The people that really put a hair in my toothbrush, though, are the "healthnuts." They're constantly lecturing you on how to be more healthful, at the same time bragging about how much time they put in at the gym. They carry on about how much they bench press and how many vegetables they've eaten today.

"Ya know," they advise "you could easily lose that spare tire if you jogged around campus and did 100 stomach crunches every day." As your throat closes up and your eyes get wet, they add, "Oh, and stop eating that bag of Doritos, for God's sake!"

So you begrudgingly throw away your Doritos (they were that cool new 3-D kind too!) and put on your dusty running shoes. You are amazed the blue-velcroed wonders have survived the years since you got them in 1985. Well, the peer pressure worked because you feel like such a schlub compared to Ms./Mr. workout. You decide you could stand to take their advice on healthful living.

So you actually did it, you became one of those God-awful people that run around campus in the midst of a monsoon. You are just so damn proud of yourself that you can't wait to tell your friend.

When you get back to your room you can't believe what you see. Your gymrat friend is passed out in a pile of empty vodka bottles and beer cans, with puke on the corner of his/her mouth. She/He has a cigarette dangling between their lips and Dorito crumbs stuck to their sweatshirt.

Before you throw your running shoes at his/her head, try to muster up enough feeling to pity the fool. While you're at it, have some pity for Fred and Sally, too. They are among the most annoying creatures on earth, but I suppose they mean well in their warped little ways. We should try and keep in mind that they're only acting out on their own personal insecurities. OK, well maybe throwing just one shoe would be alright.

Since we all suffer from what I'll call "smacking" (talking smack in high doses), you may ask, "All the symptoms are there, what should I do. Is there a talking smack 12-step program where I can get help from my higher power?" No, unfortunately, besides putting duct tape over your mouth or taking a code of silence as a nun, there's not a whole lot you can do. When you're really tempted to preach the Bible, even though you've never read it, just carefully and slowly ease your foot out of your mouth, take a deep relaxing breath, and shut up. Remember, it's OK to plead the Fifth, but only when you actually know what the Fifth is.

Julie Fialkow is a UMass student.

Why can't we stay?

I'd like to start off by saying sorry about last week. Yeah, I was in Philly, but I should have written earlier in the week, before I left.

Sorry.

But that's me. I never do anything on time. My dad (whom we all know as P.J., thank you) has been dealing with my roller-coaster motivation swings for about 22 years.

When I made the East Middle School's fabled "20 Book Club" in sixth grade, (you know, read 20 books, get an A), he was all about the praise. He said "Listen, Luke. It doesn't matter what anyone says in this world. You do what you want to do."

Thanks, P.J., even though all I did was read the back cover and fake it. (Encyclopedia Brown? Come on, if Brown solved one case, he solved them all).

Luke Meredith

When the Methuen Phillies came within one game on winning the 1987 Methuen Little League title, P.J. said he was proud of me, even though I struck out twice in the title game. (The history books will never remember the solid day patrolling centerfield. Never.)

P.J. has always let me do the one thing most other dads don't let their kids do — what they feel is best. For that, P.J. gets props.

Of course, what I feel is best often revolves around sitting on the couch watching TV.

See, I'm taking astronomy, which isn't really my bag. I needed the class, and I figured a 100 level would be a breeze. I added on the last day. Before I knew, I was being tested on words I couldn't even pronounce.

Centripetal motion? Nanometers? I got a homework question (first problem: there was homework) that read: "When Venus is at inferior conjunction a pulse of radio waves is transmitted from Earth to Venus."

Oh, really? Huh.

But there was more.

"If the reflected pulse is received 280 seconds after it was transmitted, what is Venus' distance from the earth in kilometers at its closest approach, with c=300,000 km/sec?"

Uhhh, 11?

C=42?

Thirty-seven nanometers?

I'll break down my first exam score like this. If my grade was plugged into the AP Top 25, it'd be a No. 5 seed in the East, with a first round game against Iona.

Which isn't that good.

If I fail astronomy, I'm two credits short. Which is no big deal, because I'll graduate in May anyway. Which brings me back to my summer plans. P.J. wants answers, but I don't really have answers. I mean, I don't even have a car.

Fortunately, I woke up about a week ago and it all came into focus. I broke it down to Big Red over lunch at the Bluewall. I was ready. My plan was ambitious.

A. I live in Amherst. (DeLano's in June? Good start, I say).

B. I get a "job" (not a real one, though), sublet Gary's room and relax. (If I happen to hit a few bars, hey, I hit a few bars).

C. I do interviews at my leisure, until I found the right job for me. (Not that my resume's done or anything).

Now, P.J. hadn't said a word in about five minutes. But when he did, he wasn't happy.

"You need to get a job. I mean, that's why you've been in school for five years."

Now, here I am, thinking P.J. will let me slide. I mean hey, I cover UMass hoops. How many college kids get to go to the NCAA tournament as press? I figure since this is probably my greatest accomplishment (though the 20 Book Club was nice), P.J. wouldn't mind if I chilled this summer, and contemplated my future a little longer.

P.J. has always let me do the one thing most other dads don't let their kids do — what they feel is best.

But P.J. knows better. He remembers what I did during the summer when I was little. TV, riding my bike, TV.

Not exactly the plan to a better tomorrow.

I kept pushing the plan, disguised as a "sensible backup if I don't get a job by June." P.J. wasn't budging. If he was in Amherst, he probably would have kicked me in the ass. (Wearing crazy 1991 New Balance sneaks, I might add.)

P.J.'s point?

"Hey Luke, finish your resume, get your head out of your ass, and get a job. Oh yeah, and get your head out of your ass."

He's right, you know. I mean hell, even Encyclopedia Brown must have his resume done.

Letters to the Editor

UPC needs support, not criticism

To the editor:

It's amazing how closed-minded the campus has been thinking lately. The bashing of University Productions and Concert's (UPC's) inability to put on a Spring Concert is getting out of hand. Even the Collegian has joined the act. Having been involved with UPC for two years I would like to stand up for them and straighten out some of the ignorant opinions floating around the campus.

I am disappointed with the Collegian's willingness to bash UPC while there was not one endorsement for the Student Government Association (SGA) elections on its first day.

UPC has four unpaid officers devoting their time. This may be a result of poor management and communication but it severely hinders their ability to run a small concert, let alone a Spring Concert. Students cannot afford to donate their time to run UPC when they need a weekly income.

The letter to the editor (March 3) from John Peters from Mass4Concerts is very vague and unrealistic. Although Peters may put on concerts elsewhere in the Pioneer Valley, he has not gained access to the UMass campus. This is because UMass already has a promotional group, UPC. His proposal to produce a Spring Concert for "free" will not only let him on campus as an authorized vendor, but set a precedent for him to return next year. If that happens, UPC will no longer exist and students will not learn the real world experience about the music industry.

I cannot believe that everyone including SGA points the finger at UPC when that finger should be pointing at SGA and the student body. How many people showed up to UPC's last meeting? Four. Have the members of SGA consulted with the UPC officers about the cancellation of the concert and the troubles of UPC? No, no one has offered to help, just criticize. Has anyone notice how bad SGA does every year? Why can't we cut their payroll and funding and give it to UPC to put on the concert? SGA receives over $40,000 each year! What do we get? A campus full of apathetic students who laugh at the lack of common sense pouring out of the SGA office.

If you do not like the way UPC runs its organization, then get involved. Do not lecture them on how to run a large-scale event like Spring Concert if you have no experience or do not even know the facts.

I, like everyone else on this campus, want a Spring Concert, but it has to be done with people who know how to produce such a large event. UPC has very few people who can offer their time. Donate your assistance to solve this problem.

Hadley Farm article inaccurate

To the editor:

I picked up the Collegian Monday morning (March 9), and, to my delight, spotted an article about the Hadley Farm and the UMass vet and animal science department. After reading this article, entitled "Hadley Farm Hosts 1st Equine Conference," I and many other students and faculty in this department are less than pleased with the information reported.

To quote Jason Trenkle, "A mare (female) is teased when a stallion (male) shows signs of arousal and the mare, sensing the arousal, becomes in heat." Yes, a mare is teased when a stallion shows signs of arousal. However, this does not bring the animal into heat. A mare has a set reproductive cycle, and teasing is a method to determine when the mare is in heat, or in which part of her cycle she is in, depending on her reaction to the stallion. Trenkle also states that, "the mare will not always show signs of heat, which could imply that the mare is not satisfied with her mate."

Mares in heat have one thing on their mind: reproduction. Mares are rarely selective of their stallions. Imagine if a mare wouldn't breed to a gray stallion for the sole reason that she's not partial to gray stallions. It is true that sometimes a stallion will not breed to a particular mare, but there has to be some extenuating circumstances behind it, such as a bad experience with the same mare in the past.

The article goes on to say that the breeding season of the horse is in the summer, due to longer hours, "because the horses react to long daylight by releasing a hormone that causes stimulation of the ovula." Perhaps Trenkle meant to say "ovary" instead. Trenkle continues to talk about breeding seasons by explaining that breeders prefer to have their horses bred in the winter, "so that the horses can develop into a strong breed at a young age." A horse's breed is determined by its genetics, not by the time of year it is conceived. If I breed my Thoroughbred mare in the winter, I'm not going to get a Clydesale foal.

Trenkle deserves credit for covering a topic unknown to many; however, he should have checked with someone knowledgeable of the subject before submitting his article.

Keep it on

To the editor:

I am writing in response to Gerrit DeYoung's March 11 column. I am not the least bit ashamed to say that I am part of the Jerry Springer talk show cult. I also know for a fact that I am not alone when I say this. Jerry Springer's ratings are soaring, and his viewing audiences grow larger and larger every day.

DeYoung says that "we are obsessed with the miseries of others," and "it's frightening how we find the misery of others so entertaining." Is anyone holding a gun to these guests' heads, forcing them to spill their guts on national TV? No.

I strongly believe the public ought to know by now that the Jerry Springer show is not one that should be taken seriously. It's purpose is not to educate nor to enlighten us in some way, like other talk shows out there. It is purely to entertain, and entertainment is exactly what the show provides.

I can only see continual success for Jerry in the future. So as for now, "I'm keeping it on!"

Revisiting the past

The Oscar will probably go to..

On Monday, March 23, 5,571 Hollywood insiders will determine whether the most successful movie ever made will go full steam ahead or firmly hit the iceberg. And like Titanic itself, the Academy Awards are framed by big budget spectacle and sprinkled with heartfelt displays of success and loss.

It's the biggest night in entertainment for a reason: besides the glitz and glamour the awards showcase the best in film and the selections for the 70th annual Oscar ceremony have seldom been grander. From headliners with 14 nominations L.A. Confidential and Good Will Hunting with nine each to lesser and left works we will know which of these juggernauts will take home the top prize. Or if there's any room at all. Past history makes navigating through this year's predictions a little easier — finally this fantastic year's crop of films has thankfully been recognizing lately. BEST PICTURE: TITANIC

Any other year L.A. Confidential would have been best picture, and the film noir remains Titanic's stiffest competition. Released last September but virtually unseen by audiences, L.A. Confidential swept all the major critics' awards from New York to L.A., something quite unprecedented. Erupting with cynicism, brutal truth and dark humor, Confidential tells the story of three 1950s Los Angeles police officers whose true motives come clear in the wake of a mysterious mass murder. On the surface, both the film's characters and setting seem

A TITANIC PHENOMENON

It's March — three months after the release of Titanic, and the unsinkable epic is still being sold out at your local theater. With a domestic gross of $450 million, it's poised to be the number one American film of all time, a title it already holds world-wide. Last week, the movie became the first to break the billion dollar barrier. And it hasn't even won an Oscar yet, although its record-tying 14 nominations and Golden Globe victory certainly helped escort viewers back to the theater for second, third and fourth-time showings.

Even the movie soundtrack, the first orchestration score to top the charts since way back in 1966 and Dr. Zhivago, is dominating the competition. It's the kind of cultural monopoly that probably has Bill Gates pacing his office late at night. You almost expect a Microsoft Windows in the shape of Titanic portholes coming next year.

I must confess, I've only seen Titanic twice. But I own the soundtrack, I've visited the web site and I even watched some of that behind-the-scenes television special. Of course, for some fans, this is nothing. The word "excess" does not apply when a film experience such as Titanic moves millions across the world.

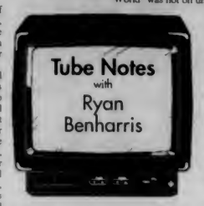
But is all of this attention warranted?

BRYAN MCALLISTER

Perhaps its quasi-religious status is not. The film is not perfect, but then again neither was Star Wars, E.T. or Jurassic Park, the movies Titanic now shares a place in history with, or rather, owns a place in history with. But surprisingly, three months down the road and there hasn't been any strong Titanic backlash. Few will be complaining if the film steams through the Oscars as expected, even fewer when it rewrites the box-office history books.

In fact, most critics — from Newsweek to Roger Ebert — have heralded Titanic's emotional power, and the significance it will have on Hollywood and filmmaking for years to come.

Titanic takes us back to the early 1900s, a period of technological boom and new ways of independent thinking and expression. But many, like the film's young Rose, are still caught in age-old conventions of upper and lower class life. Rose is expected to behave nicely, look lady-like, and keep quiet. As she describes in the film, she feels like her whole life is pre-destined.



Director James Cameron isn't subtle with his camera or his pen — he shows us everything boldly and brightly. Early in the film Rose is depicted in a corset, her

March Madness hits the tube; FOX debuts two new shows

In the words of Dick Vitale, it's March Madness, baby! If there's one time of the year we can be absolutely sure that TV fans all over the country will be glued to their sets for three solid weeks, it's tourney time. As a matter of fact, Final Four Saturday always records the second most viewers of the year (the first is that big fiasco that happens on the last Sunday in January).

So as today's games begin, all of the office pools have been filled out, and all of the high school kids have made the plans to skip school for a few days, America gets prepared for NCAA basketball.

In the next few weeks, basketball will be life to many people. It's funny how such a thing can keep teenagers home from school, and grown adults home from work, just to sit in front of their television for at least four straight days during the first and second rounds. Personally, I like the tournament much better when there are games non-stop. I like the idea that you can sit home, and turn on a game that you know is going to be a quality basketball game, and know that you'll be entertained for at least two hours. As a huge college basketball fan, I can honestly say that it is definitely a gift by the NCAA to allow the television world to watch all this basketball at once.

As everyone starts to prepare themselves for the upcoming week, the rest of the network start to prepare for a bashing by CBS and ESPN. Just like the Olympics a few weeks ago, it always takes a huge sporting event to mix up the television ratings, and give something extra for everyone to watch.

I have a gripe to pick with the wonderful people over at ABC. As I have stated before, comedies such as "Home Improvement" have lost their grass roots, and become a show about dealing with the issues. In the past two weeks, "Home Improvement" has had an episode dealing with drug use, and an absolutely terrible episode where Jill is stuck in her house with at man who, last season, asked her out, not knowing that she was married.

But the gripe I have to pick with the network involves the Friday TGIF line-up. TGIF used to be one of the best nights on TV. I remember when TGIF meant: "Family Matters," "Full House," "Step by Step," and going way back, "Growing Pains." Last Wednesday I was watching "Spin City," (which by the way is one of the best shows on television) and there was a commercial for "Boy Meets World." I vaguely remember this show when it was in its first season. The advertisement showed the lead character Corey (Ben Savage) in a bathroom drunk. What is the matter with that picture? I was so curious to what was going to happen, I actually planned to spend the first part of Friday night in my dorm room, watching "Boy Meets World."

After telling another friend of mine, about the wonderful programming that was on we sat down at 8 p.m. to watch "Boy Meets World." Little did we know that "Boy Meets World" was not on until 8:30 p.m., we were stuck watching "Sabrina the Teenage Witch." I have officially watched one episode of the worst show on television! Not only is Sabrina, the title character played by Melissa Joan Hart (last seen on Nickelodeon's "Clarissa Explains It All," another award winner) a ridiculously written character, but if you throw into it that Hart has no talent what-so-ever, it makes for a really bad mix.

Getting back to "Boy Meets World," I just couldn't believe what was going on. The actually tried to make it seem as though Corey could just walk around his home town with a bottle of Vodka in his had, completely smashed, and no one would do anything about it, until he happens to run into a police officer. The intent of the writers was clear. Since the majority of the viewers of "Boy Meets World" are predominantly pre-teens, they wanted to get an anti-drinking message across. This was a good idea, however, you can't do this if you don't have a quality show to work with.

Remember FOX's "In Living Color"? This was the show that was created by Keenan Ivory Wayans, and included many other Wayans family members and was the start of Jim Carrey's career. Well, FOX has created what could possibly be the triumphant return of the Wayans family to TV. In two weeks, "Damon," a new series staring Damon Wayans comes to FOX, where it seems that he will revisit all of his old "In Living Color" characters including the hilarious, Antone the bum. Unfortunately if this show is anything similar to any of the many attempts of the Wayans family to try to return to television, it will be a complete flop. I guess we'll just have to wait and see what happens with Damon, after it has aired.

Speaking of new FOX series, last night, the network premiered "Significant Others": because of this premier, the excellent "Party of Five" has been put on hiatus until April 22. It's the intent of Fox to gain the same viewers who watch "Party of Five" on a regular basis, and if they can achieve this goal, then "Significant Others" should prove to be a much needed hit for FOX.

Stewart treks into TV's "Moby Dick"

By Lynn Elber
Associated Press

LOS ANGELES — Captain Ahab's fateful clash with a whale is the stuff of classic literature, Patrick Stewart, who plays Ahab in the new TV miniseries "Moby Dick," had his own orcan encounter recently — but it was fit for a postcard.

Vacationing in Hawaii, the actor and his fiancée, producer Wendy Neuss, went sailing off the island of Kauai in search of the great creatures.

"We encountered two whales who, for the space of nearly an hour, breached sometimes in unison and sometimes alone, again and again and again," Stewart said.

"They were bursting out of the water, turning in the air so you could see the underside of the whale, so you could see those great fins going over and crashing back into the water.

"I swear, I felt as though we were being greeted," Stewart said.

The display came after the actor, at Ms. Neuss' urging, took off his cap reading "New Bedford Whaling Museum." Explained Stewart: "She thought it might be discouraging to the whales."

He picked up the souvenir while researching his role in "Moby Dick," the USA Network adaptation of Herman Melville's novel. The four-hour miniseries shows 8-10 p.m. EST on Sunday and Monday. It's a rousing adaptation of the story of a whaling ship captain who puts his crew at risk while obsessively pursuing the white whale that maimed him. Stewart's Ahab is Shakespearean in his wrath, and the animal is a worthy adversary — thanks to computers and Hollywood prop magic.

Besides Stewart, the program boasts other impressive on- and off-screen names. Gregory Peck, who was Ahab in the 1956 John Huston film, has a small role as Father Mapple, the preacher played by Orson Welles in the movie.

Henry Thomas (E.T., the Extra-Terrestrial) is the novice seaman Ishmael, the story's narrator, and Ted Levine (Silence of the Lambs) is First Mate Starbuck.

Unique dance troupe to perform

Pulvermacher well–known for expressing human condition

COURTESY DAVID HODGSON

Neta Pulvermacher and Dancers will perform tonight at the Hampen Theater.

By Emily Traak
Collegian Staff

Neta Pulvermacher and Dancers will bring a unique dance experience to the Hampden Theatre tonight at 8 p.m. Residential Arts, a program of the Fine Arts Center at the University of Massachusetts, will be presenting Pulvermacher and Dancers in "Zaz" and "Five Beds/Children of the Dream."

Pulvermacher and Dancers are well known for creating a cinematic language in dance and theater, giving expression to the human experience and condition. She has mastered a style characterized by fragmentation, by shards of emotion and physicality fused in flight. Pulvermacher's critically acclaimed work offers the audience a total experience that engages all of the senses.

Pulvermacher's work has been called "extraordinary ... powerful and moving... bittersweet poetry" and "forthright, rhythmic and vigorous, studded with arrests that give the impression of inner brakes slammed on," by the Village Voice. The New York Times applauded the company saying, "Neta Pulvermacher offered dance to dazzle the eye." Pulvermacher's dancers have been called "electric, moving through space with abandon and a cool concentration. Sparks seem to fly from one to the next, generating a sense of movement that expands in ripples," by the Ann Arbor Observer.

The first piece, "Five Beds/Children of the Dream," was created in collaboration with the contemporary Israeli composer Yuval Gabay. Pulvermacher blends a mosaic of voices, text, music and physically charged movement of six dancer to take the audience for a ride through the hells and heavens of the choreographer's childhood.

Pulvermacher's second piece, "Zaz," which means movement in Hebrew, was created with the East village avant-garde composer John Zorn. The Hebrew language and the richness and vitality of Israel, the combination of Zorn's music and Pulvermacher's choreography is said to be highly improvisational.

Deconstructing a rape culture

"Rape is nothing more or less than a conscious process by which all men keep all women in a constant state of fear."
— Susan Brownmiller

I remember the first time I heard the word "rape" and knew what it meant. I was seven the first time I used the word, and the woman I was speaking to demanded to know where I had learned such filthy language. That's when I learned that rape is not something to talk about; it is a shameful act, it is disgusting and it shouldn't be mentioned out loud. The thing that never made sense to me was that it wasn't particularly shameful for the man who committed the crime. It was me, the girl, who was guilty for even using the word.

I drive. Look, there's a billboard with a blonde silicone– pumped woman sprawled out, promoting a restaurant chain.

I walk. "Hey honey, nice ass!" Leering voices leap from construction sites and car windows.

I look. In my favorite art museum there are more pictures of women naked than there are actual paintings by women.

I listen. "The Accused" was on television a few nights ago, and some boys in my math class are wishing it showed more of the "sex" parts.

I think. I fear for my body and my life every time I walk to my car I'm not allowed to go downtown at night because it's not safe "for a girl."

But I don't say anything. I've been taught that the state of things is "natural," that I'm not supposed to question the patriarchy that has created this wonderful society in which women can work outside the home, where women are allowed to marry who they want, where women are "equal" to men. Oh yeah? "Equal?" Then why can't I feel safe walking my dog after the sun goes down? Why is my body public access as soon as I step outside? Why am I afraid?

The phenomenon of rape culture is not something that has sprung up in the past few years. The imbalance of the sexes, the patriarchal reign, the subservience of women, was established thousands of years ago, on the day the first rape was committed. It is this act of violence which keeps women in shackles even today.

It is very simple: men rape because they can. In ancient civilizations, the notion of a woman as an object belonging to her father or husband was cemented in law codes, as well as in cultural and religious beliefs. Because of the wide- spread practice and acceptance of rape, the rulers were very reluctant, if not entirely ignorant, of proclaiming rape as a crime.

The Code of Hammurabi (ca. 2000 B.C.) proclaimed that women were allowed "no independent status under Babylonian law. She was either a betrothed virgin, living in the house of her father, or else she was somebody's lawfully wedded wife" (Susan Brownmiller).

If a man raped a virgin, he was killed, while the girl was not considered to be guilty of any crime. However, if a married woman was raped, both she and her attacker were bound and thrown into the river, at which time the husband of the woman had the option of saving her from death if he wished.

The Bible and other documents detail how civilizations used rape to proclaim superiority over other groups of people, and to claim the women as "theirs" after a battle had taken place. Raping women also guaranteed them as wives of the rapists in some societies, so it was quite an efficient method of infiltrating an enemy tribe.

Of course, this is in keeping with the great Judeo–Christian tradition of naming Woman as the original sinner, (Eve in the Garden of Eden) thus needing to punish women for the sins of their mothers. The Biblical imagery of God, as the omnipotent presence who can punish and reward as he pleases, is powerful for many men because it implies "the ultimate male."

Helena Kvarnstrom

The fact that God is presented as a man has led many to feel that men are closer aligned to God and it's therefore permissible for them to be rulers of their domain, including "their" women.

England, a country noted for its religious devotion in many respects, was among the first to concern itself with rape as a crime. However, the only real benefactors of the laws concerning rape were women of high social and economic status. The woman was considered an object unless she had money, in which case her family worried that the rapist would marry her and leech off the family fortune.

Never was there any concern for the woman per se, as we can see by observing literature, particularly from the Gothic period. In this type of literature, women were often kidnapped and raped, only to fall in love with the men who brutalized them (this type of novel is not hard to find today; just look in your local grocery store checkout line).

The first time in history that rape was "no longer just a family misfortune and a threat to land and property, but an issue of public safety," was under the rule of Edward I. (Susan Brownmiller). This idea was revolutionary, and provided opportunities for society to condemn rape once and for all. Unfortunately, the enactment of this belief has not changed anything drastically.

America was supposedly the land of opportunity. However, since the founding of the United States as a colony by Great Britain, rape has been present every step of the way. Caucasian settlers raped Native American women, plantation owners and workers raped slaves, slaves raped white women, husbands raped wives.

The act of rape was and still is a demonstration of superiority, and relationships in which there is an inequality of power are susceptible to having rape as a part of that relationship. Because women's status (black as well as white, although black women have been exposed to even more injustice than their white sisters, because of the vicious mixture of both racism and sexism) was considered to be naturally below that of a man's, rape was seldom brought up unless it was a case of a black man raping a white woman. In such cases, it was a threat to the white power structure rather than to women.

As women began to gain more status in America, they also began to recognize that rape had to be dealt with as a social issue, as an issue of women's liberation. Although some women surely realized that rape was wrong, it was simply not discussed. The definition of rape at that time was primarily confined to the traditional "dark-alley, strange man with a knife" stereotype.

The industrial revolution at the turn of the century brought about tremendous technological advancements, providing washing machines, vacuums and the like. These appliances were designed to take care of traditional "women's work," to give women more freedom from the role of simply being a housewife.

Contrary to popular belief, the initial effects of this new technology served to lower the status of women even more. After all, if a woman did not have to clean or do dishes, what purpose did she serve, in the eyes of men? Women became less productive human beings and more like Barbie dolls, entirely economically dependent on their husbands. Women were little more than well–cared–for prostitutes in some respects, trading sex for economic stability.

Because it was one of the only things they could offer, many women felt guilty denying sex to their husbands, thereby suppressing the acknowledgment of marital rape even more.

Luckily, the women's liberation movement began to fight for women's suffrage in the beginning of the 20th century. The doors of feminism were suddenly swung open, indirectly exposing rape. Margaret Sanger, the birth control advocate and revolutionary founder of Planned Parenthood, made great strides in granting women the right to enjoy sex on their own terms, and maintaining possession of their bodies. Emma Goldman also pioneered for women's rights as well as birth control.

However, no one brought up the issue of rape specifically. After women won the right to vote, there seemed to be confusion as to what to do next. Birth control was too controversial for some, abortion was unheard of, and rape was still a fairly accepted part of American society. With the country going through the Great Depression, WWII, and the Korean War, there seemed little room at the table for women's issues.

With the end of WWII and the Red Scare flooding America, traditional values were pounded into the hearts and heads of Americans everywhere. A reincarnation of the Cult of Domesticity arose, putting women back in the kitchen with manicured nails, rather than out in the streets demanding equality.

The feminist movement of the '60s was fiercely passionate and political. It was influenced heavily by the African American civil rights movement, as well as fueled by the Vietnam War peace movement, and the stories from war veterans about the sexual exploitation of women overseas. It was during this wave of feminism, and the influx of the sexual revolution, that rape was finally brought to the forefront of the women's liberation movement.

Rape is unlike other social and political issues, because on the surface, everyone claims to be against it. Many still don't consider forced sex within marriage to be rape, and many have no idea that rape is the most frequently committed violent crime in America.

America has the highest rate of rape of any industrialized nation in the world, and much of it has to do with the way society socializes us to be either rapists or victims. It teaches us gender roles from the time girls get pink ribbons in their hair at the hospital nursery and are called "beautiful" and "precious." Boys, of course, are taught to be "tough" and "manly."

In the past 20 years, the number of reported rapes has increased by 128 percent. While this number accounts for the fact that women are reporting rape more often, it is also quite possible that rapes are increasing in number as a backlash to the feminist movement.

Stop the archaic beauty ideal

Girls, how do you feel about your bodies these days? Do you think you're fat? Do you think you're underweight? Do you wish you had the body of a model on the cover of a magazine?

For many women, body image and self–esteem go hand in hand. Often, when we feel good about our bodies, we feel good about ourselves. This feeling can carry over to other aspects of our lives: we smile more, have more motivation to do work, have higher ambitions, have more friends and better relationships. The benefits don't cease.

The pressure women and girls feel to be "beautiful" (translation: skinny) is caused by cultural expectations. From an early age, girls are conditioned to invest a great deal of time in personal appearances. Starting with the very first bedtime story, a child hears messages that a woman's most valuable asset is her appearance, and that her image can either transform her into a rich, pampered princess or a poor, lonesome servant girl.

In middle school and high school, many girls begin to read magazines such as Seventeen, YM and Teen. Eventually they graduate to "adult" girly magazines such as Glamour, Cosmo and Marie Claire. Each magazine has, literally, hundreds of images of the same skinny body type.

A girl may not consciously realize the messages she is absorbing as she reads her favorite magazine. By being exposed to images of only one rare body type, she is taught society's beauty standard, and this standard becomes her personal ideal. It's difficult to rebel against this ideal since it has been reinforced throughout a lifetime of conditioning.

In a study of gender and body image, Sharlene Hesse- Biber surveyed 960 sophomores at a private New England college. In her book Am I Thin Enough Yet?, she describes the results of a survey which asked men and women the same questions about their weight and self–perceived attractiveness.

The women who responded overestimated their relative weights, thinking their bodies were heavier than the medically desirable weights on the standard Metropolitan Life Insurance Company charts. Men, on the other hand, judged their weights more accurately.

Chrissy Brown

Ninety–five percent of the women said they wanted to lose weight, while the men were split in half between wanting to lose or gain weight.

Over three quarters of the women had dieted, compared to a third of the men. Thirty–seven percent of the women admitted to dieting "most of the time" while only 15 percent of men did.

When asked how they felt about their bodies, 37 percent of women were content, 28 percent were anxious, and seven percent felt depressed. Fifty percent of men were content with their bodies, only 6 percent were anxious and 4 percent were depressed.

When asked what they would prefer to weigh, women responded that they wanted to weigh an average of 10 pounds less. Men, however, wanted to weigh an average of one pound less. (Sharlene Hesse–Biber, Am I Thin Enough Yet?, Oxford University Press.)

These statistics should come as no surprise to many people. As mentioned before, women are conditioned to believe that in order to be beautiful, they must be thin. However, it's often impossible for women to meet such ideals because of the high degrees of stress in their lives.

Upon arrival at college, some students report a weight gain known as the "freshman fifteen." The transition from high school to college can be especially rough, as a person discovers independence for the first time while juggling schoolwork, social life and adjusting to a new environment. This stress can lead to overeating.

Students also struggle to find time to eat in the midst of hectic daytime schedules. Since it's difficult to eat a healthy meal at a convenient time, many students won't eat during the day, but pig out at night.

Despite the fact that many college women and men gain weight during their school years, many women still feel pressure to lose weight so that they will fit the ideal. Some of these efforts are motivated by eating disorders. In college populations, anorexia affects between six and 25 percent of female students. Bulimia affects between one and 19 percent. Between 25 and 85 percent of women report that they eat in "binges" (Hesse–Biber).

Healing a warped body image and crushed self–esteem begins from within. We must remember, nobody is pointing a gun to our heads telling us we must meet the media's standards of beauty. We do it to ourselves when we believe the myths and support the hype.

Of course, the media bears the responsibility of beginning to project images of realistic, everyday women in magazines, television and movies. We must stop the madness behind the archaic stereotype of what is considered beautiful. Battelines must be drawn.

Our first step in this war is to take the beauty magazines which so many are addicted to, and draw in the inches which have been deleted from models' hips, thighs, waists and butts by computer imaging. We can add back the blemishes and wrinkle lines which have been removed by airbrushing.

The next step is to send back these corrected pictures to the magazines, with a pleasant note: "The photographers have erred with this picture of Cindy Crawford. Her legs aren't really this skinny or cellulite–free, her waist is broader and her face has more blemishes than just her trademark mole. Would you quit altering the appearance of these models? No one looks this "perfect," not even Cindy Crawford."

Rape: A first semester surprise

Generally, when a girl first comes to college, she thinks of classes, parties, drinking, dating and fun. You don't wonder about rape, at least not much.

As a freshman on this campus, I was thinking about all of the above. The thought of rape was only a vague possibility at the back of my mind.

Emily Vacanti

During my first couple of weeks at school, I went for a walk with a senior. Being naive, I hadn't considered issues of safety, or the fact that it was dark outside.

We left around 9 p.m. for a tour of the campus. He ended up taking me on the Observatory Path ("the rape trail"), where he attempted to rape me. He grabbed my hips and tried to throw me to the ground.

I was informed by nameless sources that because he didn't succeed in throwing me to the ground or whacking my head against the gravel, I could do nothing about it. I never pressed charges because I was advised by many people that I would ruin both my and his life.

Should I care if I ruin his life? This man (if you can call him one) tried to rape me. My friends told me to blow it off because "that's the kind of guy he is." Still, he should never have gotten away with it.

This brings me to an important question: What should a woman do in the event of a rape or attempted rape? If you can get away before he is able to rape you, do so. Next, go to the police. Don't clean yourself up at all. The more evidence, the better. After the police take care of you, tell a friend whom you completely trust.

Talk it out. As one who has been raped once and attacked more times, I know it's best to talk it out. Then you can fully admit to yourself what happened, and begin to feel better.

Tell your parents. In the event that your parents want to pull you out of school but you want to stay (this happened to me when I told my parents), reassure them that you went to the police and they have it under control.

If you feel comfortable talking to a therapist, go for it. Get everything out. Cry, punch inanimate objects, yell every swear word in the book, whatever it takes. The longer the pain builds up in you, the harder your life will become. Talk it out.

Regarding UMass campus security, I think it's great. When I was first attacked, I told a Head Security Supervisor. He took care of me right away. He told me about the many options I had, and he completely supported me. As far as rape goes, campus security and police do their job.

Now, it's our job. We have to stop letting men get away with this. We have to better prepare ourselves in the event that rape should occur. Learn self–defense.

Men must stop raping us. Rape and sexual assault are not a joke, and I am not taking it anymore.

Distorted media images & eating disorders

"I battle this illness both inside and out... and in again. I've been hospitalized seven times. I am 23, my body thinks it's far older than that. My bones are brittle, my heart weak and erratic, my esophagus and stomach riddled with ulcers, my reproductive system shot, my immune system useless. But I'm alive."

As I read the above article about Marya Hornbacher in the Daily Hampshire Gazette, her words struck a chord. The article interviewed Hornbacher — a bulimic at age nine, anorexic at 15, and author of Wasted: A Memoir of Anorexia and Bulimia.

Surely I am not the only woman who can relate to Hornbacher's account. We, as women, have encountered distorted images of ourselves from the time we were children, receiving our first Barbies.

In America, at least 8 million people suffer from eating disorders. An estimated 6 percent of the afflicted die, and 90 percent of these cases are women (from the National Association of Anorexia Nervosa and Associated Disorders). The majority of the sufferers are adolescent or young women.

If you don't have an eating disorder yourself (or some form of one), you probably have a friend who does. How many times have you asked one of your girlfriends, "Do I look fat in this?"

We have all done it. It's because of that body image thing that bombards us on television, in movies, on MTV, in magazines, billboards, you name it.

Kelly Parent

We still live in a country in which the phrase "You can never be too rich or too thin" is the national motto. You just have to flip through the pages of Cosmo or Mademoiselle to see the demeaning, ridiculously pencil–thin images of models who look like they haven't gone through puberty yet.

It's normal to get bigger hips and curves when you enter your teens, isn't it? Apparently not, according to the images we are constantly presented with by the media.

Being 5 feet tall, I cannot appreciate the fact that women 6 feet tall and over are supposed to represent some perfect ideal. We need to change the way this country views the "perfect woman," because women like us are the real women!

Free anonymous screenings for eating disorders are available at 1,000 sites nationwide. To find one near you, call 1–800–969–6642, or go to the website: www.nmisp.org.

Eating disorders do not discriminate by economic, social, cultural or age groups. A disorder is not a "phase" a person goes through, it is an addictive disorder comparable to alcoholism or drug abuse. It appears to be an attempt at taking and maintaining control in one's life. Possible consequences are death from starvation, cardiac arrest and irreparable damage to reproductive (as well as other) bodily systems.

We must make a difference with the women of our generation by changing the unrealistic images constantly perpetuated by the media. Lately there have been some advances — I have seen more magazines with portrayals of beautiful women with larger bodies (for instance, the new publication Mode, which is a fashion magazine specifically for larger women).

Hollywood legend Lloyd Bridges dead from natural causes

By Oscar Musibay

COURTESY ASSOCIATED PRESS
Lloyd Bridges, who made his mark in the comedy Airplane!, passed away Tuesday evening. He was 85 years old.

LOS ANGELES — Lloyd Bridges, who survived a 1950s government blacklisting to build a five-decade acting career highlighted by the movie Airplane! and the early TV series "Sea Hunt," has died at 85.

The patriarch of a three-generation acting family died at his home Tuesday of natural causes with his wife Dorothy, son Beau and daughter Cindy at his side. He had suffered from a heart condition since 1992.

"We all feel really blessed to have been with my dad for these 85 years," Beau Bridges said outside the home. "If dad could speak to those people who are thinking about him right now, he would want you to all think about family."

The tall, blond actor enjoyed amazing resiliency throughout his career, even surviving the film industry's political blacklist. He played everything, from an underwater investigator in "Sea Hunt" to guest parts as the zany Izzy Mandelbaum on "Seinfeld" and the drug-addled air traffic controller in Airplane!

His sons, Beau and Jeff, started acting as youngsters on "Sea Hunt" and became stars in their own right.

The family often worked together, more often in the past decade. In 1988, Bridges appeared with Jeff in Tucker: The Man and His Dream and had a recurring role on Beau's 1993 television series "Harts of the West."

An episode of the 1995 cable remake of the "The Outer Limits" featured Beau with smaller roles played by the elder Bridges and grandson Dylan. The patriarch introduced grandson Jordan in the 1986 TV movie "Thanksgiving Promise," which also featured Beau and Jeff and his wife.

Married more than 50 years, the Bridges lived in Westwood, a short distance from the UCLA campus where they met as drama students.

Actress Shirley Jones, a longtime friend who played Bridges' girlfriend in the 1969 made-for-TV movie "Silent Night, Lonely Night," said he stood out for his kindness and integrity — as well as his acting.

"He could combine comedy and drama and play a villain. He was a wonderful villain and a western star," she said. "He was such a fine actor, a giving actor and a gentleman — and a lot of actors aren't. I miss him dearly."

Lloyd Vernet Bridges Jr. was born Jan. 15, 1913, in San Leandro, near San Francisco. A star athlete in college, he trained as a classical actor and got his first movie role in the early 1940s. He played Gary Cooper's vengeful deputy in High Noon in 1952 and other important roles followed until he was caught in Hollywood's Red purge.

During the 1940s, Bridges had been a member of the Actors' Lab, a radical theater group that staged plays in Hollywood. At the height of McCarthyism in the 1950s, his name was added to the industry blacklist.

"I was always against prejudice of any kind, and when I was a member of the Actors' Lab, there was an opportunity to do something as part of a group to stop prejudice and help people," he said in 1971.

Bridges cleared his name with the FBI and congressional committees and was allowed to work again.

In 1957, Bridges took the role that changed his career: Mike Nelson, a Navy frogman turned undersea investigator in "Sea Hunt." The networks turned down the series as being too limited in scope, so producer Ivan Tors offered it in syndication a year later. Soon it drew bigger ratings than the network shows and it lasted for 156 episodes.

Bridges starred in six other series: "The Lloyd Bridges Show," "The Loner," "San Francisco International Airport" "Joe Forrester," "Paper Dolls" and "Capital News." He also appeared in dozens of TV movies as well as such miniseries as "Roots," "Moviola," "East of Eden," "The Blue and the Gray" and "George Washington."

Bridges and his wife received the Ralph Bunche Peace Award in 1994 to commemorate the United Nations Year of the Family. Survivors include his wife, sons, daughter and several grandchildren.

strings being tightly drawn around her like a puppet. Enter Jack, the worldly free-spirit, who talks of amusement parks, horseback riding, and airplanes. When Jack draws her portrait later in the movie, the scene has more significance than just to show a nude Kate Winslet. Jack has not only saved her from suicide, but from her constraints as well. Fittingly, a final sequence shows portraits of Rose riding and flying.

The appeal of Titanic is partly in this craftsmanship. Everything is tied together, beginning with the 101-year old Rose. Showing us the real Titanic and telling us old Rose's story brings the tale closer to us, primarily via visual magic. We get the same doll-face at the bottom of the ocean as the one in a little girl's arms, the same diamond worn by young Rose, the "heart of the ocean," in old Rose's hands as she lets it go into the sea's depths.

James Cameron

Depicted in ultra-romantic vistas, forbidden, and tragic, the love story is central to Titanic's allure, and I have a feeling the film would have been just as successful with or without Leonardo DiCaprio. Don't get me wrong, the star with hordes of female fans is certainly a main reason for the epic's success. Females return for repeat showings because of him. And even guys can identify with DiCaprio's aggressiveness — or rather, Jack's — independent, underdog persona.

This love story, though, is less about upper and lower deck adventures and more about sacrifices — both from Jack and from Rose. "You jump, I jump" is a line repeated twice in the film, from the first meeting to the last night. Rose sacrifices her classy life for one with less assurance but more freedom, and Jack makes an equally big one, constantly putting his life in danger, and ultimately giving it up, for Rose's physical and mental survival.

It would have been funny sitting in on the pitch meetings for all this a couple of years ago. Cameron is one of Hollywood's A-list directors, but the story of star-crossed lovers on a historically doomed voyage isn't exactly one to attract excitement. No happy ending, no possibilities for a sequel, no merchandise tie-ins — everything Hollywood hates, but somehow Cameron convinced two studios to back him.

Even when everything turned to panic, and Titanic soared to a budget of $200 million, Cameron remained confident in the picture, foregoing his salary and working extra-long hours to finish the film. Rumor has it he only took one day off last year — to get married. There wasn't even time for a honeymoon.

Inviting comparisons to such mega-flops as Cleopatra, Heaven's Gate, and Waterworld, Titanic needed extensive special-effects work, missed its summer release date, and was pushed to Dec. 19, 1997. But in a rare twist of luck, this late release gave Titanic more room to navigate and full-blown Oscar consideration.

I don't think it's jumping the gun to say that the last hour of Titanic is one of the most enthralling and moving pieces of film ever made. Creating a 90 percent replica of the ship, Cameron edits the film in almost real-time, so as everything is happening we're caught right along with it. Since we've already seen how the ship will sink via computer graphics, our anticipation of exactly how this will unfold is absolutely breathtaking. Using camera angles from far above and below the ship, Cameron depicts this heartwrenching confrontation between man and machine, sparing us no small detail. A parallel is made — as the ship destructs, so do some of the supposedly "feeling" humans; they only wish to save themselves or they are so psychically numbed, they don't realize their very god-like lives are in danger.

Titanic is smart, though, in that it's scott-free of cynicism and full of hope. It still manages to show the varying degrees of honor and humiliation the ship's passengers and creators undergo. Little touches like the mini-orchestra playing with the ship's demise and the captain going down with his ship highlight Titanic's heartwrenching finale.

It's most admirable that our strongest characters during this plight are women, from the "unsinkable" Molly Brown to Rose herself. Like all Cameron females, Rose is strong physically and mentally. She frees Jack from his handcuffs, jumps from her lifeboat, and ultimately survives to live her own free life.

Some have cited DiCaprio's own plunge to the sea as the most emotional moment, but my choice comes when we see the 1000-plus passengers floating helplessly in the sea. It's a final sign of the follies of human progress and technology. Arrogant men thinking technology allows them to play god is a theme which strikes close to heart especially today. Titanic may have been the ship of dreams, but it's a movie painted in majestic strokes of reality.

Of course, being a motion picture framed by big-budget and spectacle, Titanic could be guilty of such arrogance itself. But despite its success, the film started out as an underdog, and only later became the grandest movie ever built, plowing through 12 weeks of being virtually unchallenged at the box-office. Ironically, the film most worthy to knock Titanic from its perch is this Friday's The Man in the Iron Mask, starring DiCaprio in not one, but two, starring roles. It's a guy's worst nightmare, but Hollywood's dream come true.

And as the days loom to Oscar night, DiCaprio, Kate Winslet, Billy Zane, James Horner and the hardest working man in entertainment, James Cameron, may realize their dreams as well.

formance, aided by equally warm portrayals by Robin Williams, Minnie Driver and Ben Affleck, enhanced an already perfectly scripted film. Good Will Hunting only lacks the grandeur of its competitors, and will hopefully win a well-deserved original screenplay award.

As Good as it Gets and The Full Monty, while engaging films in their own right, don't really belong in the same company. The Academy already awarded them via their nominations.

As always, the motives behind a Titanic victory wouldn't be without clever politics. Hollywood's reputation has suffered in recent years, and their dollars are threatened by the onslaught of the Internet and other forms of interactive entertainment. But here we have throw-back to old Hollywood filmmaking, a film both moralistic and spectacular. A loss for Titanic would be a shock to the legions of fans who have never even heard of L.A. Confidential. If this is suggesting that the Academy might sacrifice critical right for the good of the industry, don't forget that Titanic is not without its laurels. It's the best picture of 1997.

BEST DIRECTOR: James Cameron

Even if Titanic fails to win, Cameron's nod for best director is the biggest lock of the ceremony. Cameron was virtually a one-man show behind the biggest movie ever made, writing the script, producing, directing, editing and supervising the special effects, done by his own visual effects company. This much devotion aside, his direction is superb — Cameron is constantly sweeping his camera through a perfectly designed ship as craftsmanship and art are beautifully combined. While it could be argued that Confidential director Curtis Hanson ran a tighter ship and facilitated better performances, the Academy always loves do-it-yourself acts like Cameron.

BEST ACTOR: Robert Duvall

Speaking of independent acts, Robert Duvall's self- financed role in The Apostle should ensure an Oscar victory. Duvall played a down-and-out preacher, and the Academy has always taken heart to such troubled characters, most recently Geoffrey Rush in Shine and Nicholas Cage in Leaving Las Vegas. But his performance was also an uplifting portrayal of a man with the determination and inspiration to overcome hardships and lead others to salvation.

Duvall has very competitive and prestigious company, namely sentimental favorite Peter Fonda (Ulee's Gold). Fonda deserves this award as much as Duvall, but will likely be eclipsed by recent Academy trends, including one that snubbed another sentimental favorite, Lauren Bacall, last year.

This is Jack Nicholson's 11th nomination. While his comically brilliant and affectionate Scrooge-type in As Good as it Gets carried an already great movie, it wasn't much of a departure for Nicholson; he's already won twice for better roles.

Meanwhile, Wag the Dog's Dustin Hoffman, and even Matt Damon, are filler spots. Neither has much of a chance.

BEST ACTRESS: Judi Dench

Dench is the safest pick among a slew of British thespians up for this year's award. The odd-on favorite to win, Dench, carrying Mrs. Brown in her first leading role, was helped significantly by a Golden Globe win, especially since the Golden Globes normally award more popular, marketable stars.

Helena Bonham Carter, in Wings of the Dove, has the best chance to oust Dench. Carter smoldered through a costume drama role and fits the Academy's likings. Julie Christie is the sentimental favorite for her performance in Afterglow; Christie last won an Oscar way, way back in 1965.

The sleeper pick here is Helen Hunt. You have to admire her determination to take on two jobs, and her troubled single mom in As Good as it Gets was much a departure from Mad About You. Young star Kate Winslet, like Damon, is a filler; even if Titanic sweeps, she has little chance.

BEST SUPPORTING ACTOR: Burt Reynolds

One of the superb elements of this year's Oscars is the heavy competition for best supporting actor and actress, made up of old Hollywood favorites and forgotten stars. Boogie Nights was a eclectic and poignant portrayal of the porn world which also significantly brought back Burt Reynolds to the big screen. The Academy loves comedic performances for the supporting category, so Reynolds has that advantage as well over veterans Anthony Hopkins and Robin Williams.

But the most deserving actor here is Robert Forster, virtually brought back from the dead and one of the only good things in Jackie Brown. Hopefully the Academy will see through Reynold's popularity and select the most multi- faceted performer.

BEST SUPPORTING ACTRESS: Joan Cusack

Kim Basinger (L.A. Confidential) won the Golden Globe; Gloria Stuart is the sentimental favorite. Both may cancel each other out, leaving room for Joan Cusack to step up and take the award. Her hilarious portrayal of Kevin Kline's wife in In & Out should be awarded as a representation of the great character acting this past year.

However, I wish the Academy would recognize Julianne Moore, the most versatile actress in Hollywood. The artsy star also headlined last summer's The Lost World in addition to her great role in Boogie Nights.

who carried the film on her back and made Contact as much a personal journey as an extraterrestrial one. She could have easily taken the place that Kate Winslet, riding Titanic's waves, doesn't deserve.

But snubs aside, the selection for this year's awards celebrate a return to classical filmmaking, and there's nothing wrong with that. But the Academy should remember in the future that they've always recognized the off-beat, the intelligent and the unique. Perhaps after Titanic's engines quiet down, next year will bring a slew of small brilliance to the big screen.

Jonathan DePina leads the charge for the Minutemen.

Washington. But they were rewarded for a tough non-conference slate with a No. 7 seed in the South regional and have come to see the positive in their early exit in the A-10s.

"We got a couple extra days of rest after losing to GW," UMass coach Bruiser Flint said. "Whether we win or lose, people shouldn't be disappointed in [our season]. I know I'm not. [Down the stretch], we lost some close games to some very good teams."

St. Louis, a member of Conference USA, doesn't have much national recognition, but they do have Larry Hughes— arguably the nation's finest freshman. Hughes averaged 21.4 points a game this season, and sophomore forward Mike Babul will draw the task of defending Hughes. Babul was named to the Atlantic-10's All-Defensive Team, and the Minutemen are confident Babul can contain the high-flying freshman.

"I'm really impressed with Larry Hughes," Flint said. "He's an all-around player. He doesn't just score, he rebounds, he plays good defense. [St. Louis] plays well together. they have [good chemistry]."

Tyrone Weeks, who sat out most of the A-10 tournament with a twisted left ankle, is listed as questionable for tomorrow's game. Weeks played nine minutes in the first half against GW, but couldn't go in the second half. If Weeks can't make the start, sophomore Ajmal Basit is expected to start in his place.

Though many thought the tournament committee might keep Massachusetts in Hartford, site of an East regional, the Minutemen are actually glad they were shipped elsewhere. From relatives nagging for tickets to friends in the stands, distractions can be a problem close to home.

"We're a better team on the road," sophomore guard Monty Mack said. "It will help us a lot [being in Atlanta], easier to focus on the road."

The main thing that worries Massachusetts is that they don't know much about the Billikens. UMass and St. Louis have only met once, with UMass winning 80-74 Jan. 5, 1995 in the Kiel Center in St. Louis.

"I'm concerned because we really don't know much about them, [besides Hughes]," junior center Lari Ketner said. "Hopefully we don't take them lightly. Guys are excited, [because] if we come out and play hard, we have the chance to play Michigan, UCLA and Kentucky."

Minutemen notes

The AP All-American teams were announced on Tuesday. Arizona guards Miles Simon and Mike Bibby, Kansas forwards Raef LaFrentz and Paul Pierce and North Carolina forward Antwan Jamison made up the first team. It's the first time two teams have two members each on the first team. The last teams to have two members on the first team include UNLV's Stacy Augmon and Larry Johnson in 1991, and UNC's Michael Jordan and Sam Perkins in 1984. UConn's Richard Hamilton, Notre Dame's Pat Garrity, Ole Miss' Ansu Sesay, UNC guard Vince Carter and Michigan St. guard Mateen Cleaves were named to the second team.

Nobody seems to know what a Billiken is, but consensus around the UMass camp is it's a dwarf, with a logo similar to that of the old St. Louis Browns, who left St. Louis in 1953 to become the Baltimore Orioles... Ketner and Mack, the team's top two scorers this season, weren't on the team during former coach John Calipari's reign, but both list games during the Final Four run in 1996 as their favorite NCAA highlights. Mack, a UNLV fan in the early '90s, called the UMass-Georgetown Elite Eight game his favorite, and Ketner said the UMass-Kentucky matchup in the Final Four was the most memorable game he's seen.

Mo Vaughn refuses Sox alcohol evaluation request

By Jimmy Golen
Associated Press

FORT MYERS, Fla. — Mo Vaughn refused Boston's request that he undergo an alcohol evaluation, saying yesterday the Red Sox are using his arrest on drunken driving charges as an excuse not to sign him.

The first baseman, acquitted last week in Dedham District Court, said the team told him it would not resume negotiations on a long-term deal until it was certain Vaughn does not have a drinking problem. But Vaughn said the request was the first volley of an effort to blame him if he leaves via trade or free agency.

"Watch out for the smear campaign. It'll be coming soon to a theater near you. And it will be a double feature, gentlemen," he said. "Next I'll be doing drugs. Then I'll be selling drugs. They're going to paint a whole pattern of negativity. That's typical of the way things go around here."

Boston has signed Pedro Martinez, Nomar Garciaparra, John Valentin and Troy O'Leary to long-term deals. But negotiations with Vaughn, a former MVP, stalled in November.

He wants a five-year deal. The Red Sox have offered no more than three.

"They took care of who they wanted to take care of," Vaughn said yesterday, a day after Garciaparra agreed to a deal that could bring him $44.25 million over seven years. "If I had a general manager who liked me, my deal would be done, too."

Vaughn is a clubhouse spokesman who frequently butts heads with the front office over his outspoken style and his exuberant lifestyle. He says it's all part of his role as leader, but general manager Dan Duquette has made no secret of his desire for Vaughn to toe the team's line.

"They want to control your every move. That's why I'm not signed, and no other reason," said Vaughn, who sat out yesterday's game against Baltimore because of an eye infection.

"Yes, I've been critical of the Red Sox. But I've only been critical to help the team win ... not to get me any more or less. That's why there isn't a deal. All the other things are just smokescreens.

"They go, 'Mo, we want you to be a good little boy now' ...If that's what they want, they will never, ever get that."

Duquette was not available for comment. He spoke on a Boston radio show yesterday under an agreement he not be asked about Vaughn, saying he would issue a statement next week.

But the 30-year-old Vaughn thinks his negotiations are following a pattern established with Roger Clemens, when the team made a low first offer and then, after the market got too pricey, criticized his work habits in the newspapers.

"I'm prepared, though," Vaughn said. "I've been schooled." "Who was your teacher?" he was asked.

"Roger Clemens," Vaughn said.

"I'm not really frustrated. I think this whole thing is funny," he said. "But everybody ought to expect it."

Vaughn's contract negotiations are a constant theme in the Red Sox clubhouse. In 1996, they dragged into spring training before he agreed to an $18.6 million, three-year deal.

But it only took about a year before the subject came up again because he's eligible for free agency after this season. Last fall, Duquette said he would trade Vaughn rather than let him get away for nothing.

In January, Vaughn was in a car accident while returning from a strip club at 2 a.m. He was charged with drunken driving and acquitted.

Pete Rose speaks of hitting; could cause Red's trouble

By Alan Robinson
Associated Press

SARASOTA, Fla. — Pete Rose always liked nothing better than talking about hitting. His one-hour talk yesterday to some attentive Cincinnati minor leaguers, however, may have hurt his bid to reverse his lifetime ban.

Rose, standing on a practice field about 50 yards from a batting cage recently named for him, gave an impromptu motivational speech to nearly 100 minor leaguers, including son Pete Jr., an infielder with the Reds' Indianapolis farm club.

Baseball said the talk violated the lifetime ban Rose agreed to nearly nine years ago.

"Pete Rose was in clear violation of the agreement," said Rich Levin, the spokesman for acting commissioner Bud Selig. "We are waiting for a complete written report from the Reds, at which time we will take appropriate action."

The Reds may be fined as a result of Rose's speech, a baseball official said, speaking on condition he not be identified. Rose, who agreed to accept the ban following baseball's investigation of his gambling, applied for reinstatement Sept. 26. Selig and the ruling executive council haven't discussed his bid, and Selig, according to several officials, isn't inclined to allow Rose back in the game.

Tuesday's speech may turn into another strike against Rose, the baseball official said.

Rose had received permission from the team to watch his son work out, but there was no prior indication he would make a speech. Rose is welcome at ballparks but can have access only to areas fans are allowed in, Reds president John Allen had said Rose would receive "no special treatment above and beyond Joe Fan."

Baseball's career hits leader said it was the first time he had stood before a professional team since he resigned as the Reds manager at the conclusion of his gambling probe in 1989.

Rose, a 17-time All-Star and the National League's MVP in 1973, agreed to the lifetime ban on Aug. 23, 1989. The ban also has excluded Rose from the Hall of Fame because players under suspension cannot be listed on the ballot.

"I'm not here to cause any trouble," Rose said after receiving a loud ovation from the players, including his son and Craig Griffey, the son of former teammate Ken Griffey. "I want to help save baseball in Cincinnati. It doesn't matter who you're talking to... just speak the truth and tell it the way it is."

It was not clear if a Reds employee asked Rose to give the talk. Rose talked at length beforehand with Donnie Scott, the Reds' minor league coordinator, and shook hands with Scott immediately afterward.

Wearing a white pullover shirt and jeans, and leaning on a bat, Rose often used profanity-filled humor to implore players to work harder than those in other organizations, urging them to, "Win and get the Cincinnati Reds back on the map."

"Always expect to win," he said during the talk, which followed an hour-long session with reporters. "Don't be like the Cubs. You know what God told the Cubs, don't you? 'Don't do anything until I get back.'"

Horoscopes

PISCES (Feb. 19–March 20) — You may be unusually emotional all day long, but later a situation at work will require that you consider things in a more rational fashion.

ARIES (March 21–April 19) — You may have to depend more than usual today on the assistance and willingness of those around you. Do not try to do too much on your own.

TAURUS (April 20–May 20) — You have a fine memory for details, and today this seemingly minor attribute is likely to pay off for you in spades. Pay attention to all signals.

GEMINI (May 21–June 20) — Take care you don't fall into a pattern of behavior that others could interpret as vindictive. Revenge is not for you at this time.

CANCER (June 21–July 22) — You don't want to do anything that could rub someone important the wrong way. There are risks to take, surely, but do so courteously.

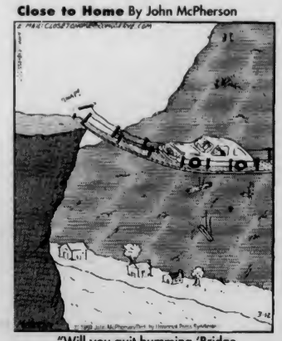
LEO (July 23–Aug. 22) — It may be a while before you can touch base with a guide or mentor. Remain confident and assert your independence gracefully, as much as you can.

VIRGO (Aug. 23–Sept. 22) — Your memory for past details can prove valuable to you today, as you sort out things from a long time ago. You may learn a surprise lesson.

LIBRA (Sept. 23–Oct. 22) — You may be attracted today to all things mysterious and unexplained. A loved one is hoping that this is just a phase — and it is.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23–Nov. 21) — Concentrate on doing whatever is necessary to increase the comfort and convenience level of your home. All domestic issues take precedence.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22–Dec. 21) — As tempted as you may be, this is not a good day to play hooky. There are one or two duties you must tend to before the day is out.



CAPRICORN (Dec. 22–Jan. 19) — You will enjoy reveling in memories today, but be sure that you are inspired to move forward rather than backward when all is said and done.

AQUARIUS (Jan 20.–Feb. 18) — You will catch a glimpse of where you want to be today, and also of the path you must take if you wish to get there. Do not hesitate: start now!

UMass basketball teams prepare for NCAAs

THANG VO / COLLEGIAN

Center Lan Ketner and the Massachusetts men's basketball team get set to tip off against St. Louis tomorrow.

Men to battle St. Louis as they focus in on Hughes

By Luke Meredith
Collegian Staff

So what exactly is a Billiken anyways?

The Massachusetts men's basketball team (21–10, 12–4 Atlantic 10) will find that out, along with a few things about themselves, tomorrow when they take on St. Louis (21–10, 11–5 C-USA) in the first round of NCAA tournament at the Georgia Dome in Atlanta. The UMass–St. Louis game will begin at approximately 2:45 p.m., 30 minutes after the conclusion of the Kentucky–South Carolina St. game, which tips off at 12:30 p.m. on CBS.

This is the seventh straight year UMass has made the NCAA tournament, but they aren't exactly rolling into Atlanta on a hot streak. Massachusetts has lost four of their last six games, including another disappointing exit in the A–10 tournament quarterfinals to George

Women face experience as they play Iowa

By Jackie Leroux
Collegian Staff

After working hard all season and proving wrong all those who doubted them, the Massachusetts women's basketball team (19–10, 11–5) has gotten its reward. They were invited to dance.

Invited to dance in the Big Dance, more specifically. The No. 13 Minutewomen will take on the No. 4 seed Iowa (17– 10, 13–3) tomorrow night.

UMass and the Hawkeyes will be squaring off in Iowa City at 9:20 p.m. Playing in front of the Hawkeyes hometown fans, the Minutewomen are unlikely to have many supporters in the stands of the Carver–Hawkeye Arena, but coach Joanie O'Brien is confident that her players can handle the pressure.

"Anytime you go on the road it's a challenge," O'Brien said. "And the NCAA brings a lot of intensity, and the young players will have never felt that before, and there's nothing you can compare it to.

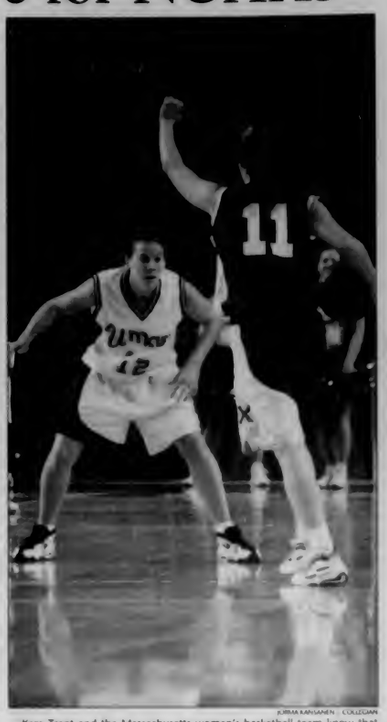
"But if your confident enough in yourself, and what you can do, than you handle things, and this team has been a very good road team... it's going to be a challenge, but it's going to be fun."

This is just the second time UMass has made it to the NCAA Tournament. The Hawkeyes have made 11 consecutive appearances since 1986, including a trip to the Final Four in 1993. Last year Iowa advanced to the second round, where they fell to powerful Connecticut, 72–53.

Iowa, a member of the Big Ten conference, lost in the semifinal round of their conference tournament to No. 5 seed Purdue. They had entered the tournament as the top seed, winning the Big Ten regular season title with their 13– 3 record.

The Hawkeyes have four players averaging in double figures in scoring, topped by senior Tangela Smith. A 6'4" center out of Chicago Ill., she heads into tomorrow's game averaging 19.6 points a game. Smith also pulls down a team–high average of 8.5 boards a game. She leads the team in blocked shots (46) and field goal percentage (53.9) as well.

The imposing center has scored in double figures for 21 straight games. She was named the Big Ten Player of the Year, a member of the All–Conference first team, and earned Honorable Mention on the All–America team. She was also honored by the Chicago Tribune, as the newspaper named her its Big Ten most valuable player.



Also joining Smith on the All–Conference Team were seniors Angela Hamblin and Nadine Domond. Hamblin, a 6– foot guard/forward, is second on the team in scoring with 12.6, and third in rebounding with 5.9. She was named to the second team All–Conference. Domond was also named to the second team, leading Iowa with 43 three–point field goals, 91 assists and 39 steals on the year. She is fourth on the team in scoring, with 12.1 points per game.

Iowa finished the season ranked No. 23 in the Associated Press poll. They finished their season on a similar streak to UMass, rampaging on a seven game win streak, before falling to Purdue.

"They are an excellent basketball team... I'm sure they are going to want to end things on their home court in a big way, so we'll definitely be challenged," O'Brien said. "They have a great inside game. I would say their strength comes in their four and five players, and they are very athletic."

Working on UMass' side will be the tournament experience of some of their veteran players. The Minutewoman went to the NCAA's in 1996, losing in the first round to Michigan. Seniors Sabriya Mitchell and Kara Tudman, along with juniors Yolanda Rayside and Jaywana Bradley were all a part of that team.

"Hopefully that will be a key for us, the mental part," O'Brien said. "I guess we'll find out if the nerves for it are going to exist. I told them that it's okay to be nervous, but its not okay to be scared."

UM's Fisher lands perfect 10 on mat

Gymnast hopes leap onto national scene as she lead UMass on the floor routine

By Brett Mauser
Collegian Staff

Walking off the floor to the roar of the UMass crowd in the meet versus West Virginia and M.I.T., freshman gymnast Jill Fisher knew she had just landed the best routine of her collegiate career thus far. The fans rose to their feet, chanting for a perfect score, but that certainly was not an unfamiliar environment. A perfect 10 had landed just out of Fisher's grasp on numerous occasions.

"When the 10 came up, I went crazy," said Fisher. "It's not often that anyone can call themselves perfect."

Her routine that night perhaps has defined Jill Fisher. After all the close calls, Fisher at last had reached one of her goals, never settling for what was good enough for a win.

Massachusetts has something special in Fisher. Seven meets into her career in Amherst, Fisher has already posted five of the top six scores in UMass women's gymnastics history on the floor routine. Fisher has more in store.

"I would love to become the national champion on the floor, but I know I have a lot of work to do before I can have that opportunity," said Fisher.

Freshman Jill Fisher

After capturing the 1997 Junior Olympics floor exercise crown, Fisher chose UMass over national powerhouses Georgia and Florida.

"I really liked [Massachusetts women's gymnastics coach Dave Kuzara]. He came to my house, and when we talked, we really clicked," said Fisher. "I also really liked the team and I wanted to stay close to home."

Fisher added that UMass alum and her coach Tammy Marshall had a tremendous effect on her decision. Marshall herself gained fame wearing the maroon and white, winning the 1993 NCAA floor exercise crown and the 1992 vault championship.

"Tammy has had an incredible influence on everything I have ever achieved," said Fisher. "She made me realize how fun gymnastics is and how important it is to excel both as a gymnast and as a person."

A New Yorker all her life, Jill found her way into the world of gymnastics via ballet. When she was six, she took dance classes and her teacher hinted to Jill's mother that her daughter was too hyperactive for ballet. She suggested gymnastics. The rest is in the books.

At eight, she was already competing. The word was out that little Jill Fisher was a winner. Despite her God–given ability to perform, the Olympics were just an afterthought. The glory of garnering a gold medal never became an issue in the Fisher household.

"I knew right from the start that I was going to go to college," said Fisher. "Any gymnast has thought about it, but I have never looked at it as a serious option."

Fisher ranks second in the nation behind Georgia's Kristen Lichey on floor. In her brief stay in Amherst, Fisher has scored a 9.900 or better in five of the seven meets. Against three highly–touted opponents in Alabama, Arizona State and North Carolina State, Fisher finished second on the floor with a 9.975, second only to a perfect score.

But she doesn't focus on just one event. Her talents extend beyond the mat.

She won the 1995 Junior Olympics balance beam title. This season, she has scored among the top ten individually for both the beam and vault. She registered a 9.725 on vault in the Alabama meet to place fifth.

"I hope that maybe I can compete in the all–around, but I have to work harder on the uneven bars to get there," said Fisher.

Fisher has plenty of incentive to achieve the goal. She and Marshall have a running joke going where Fisher claims that she came to UMass to break every one of her colleague's records.

"I called her up after the West Virginia meet and said 'that's one'," said Fisher. "She was so excited for me. She made me what I am today."

The work ethic will always be there. A rigorous practice schedule has taken its toll on Fisher, but through it all, she claims to be tired at times, but never bored.

"Gymnastics is so much a part of my life that I could never get bored," said Fisher. "I love the competition so much. In my mind, there is nothing like going out in front of the home crowd and competing. It is such a rush."

After college, Fisher hopes to coach gymnastics or open up her own gym on Long Island, near her hometown of Dix Hills.

Coach Kuzara understands what he has in this self– proclaimed hyperactive workhorse.

"We have brought a lot of gymnasts here to Amherst to improve this program," said Kuzara, "but years down the road, when the fans look back, I think the gymnast that will stick out in their minds the most is Jill Fisher. She electrifies the crowd like no one I have ever coached."

Women's water polo set for games in California

By Paul Teves
Collegian Staff

The No. 9 Massachusetts women's water polo team is heading to California for the week of spring break. Over the course of the week the Minutewomen will put their ranking to the test as they face some of the top–ranked teams in the country.

UMass will first play Redlands on Sat., March 14 and then No. 6 University of Southern California on Monday. Other big matches will include No. 7 San Diego State. Possibly their most challenging meet could be with the number one team in the nation, UCLA.

The week concludes with the Claremont Invitational, which will probably also include games against USC and UCSD.

"We will probably play nine to 10 matches this week included next weekend's tournament. We need to continue doing what we've been doing to be successful," UMass coach Dan McOsker said.

He also commented on the goals of his team for this week. "We are going to continue running the front and lanes defense, and attack with a very structured offense, and see how we do against the best teams and go from there," McOsker said.

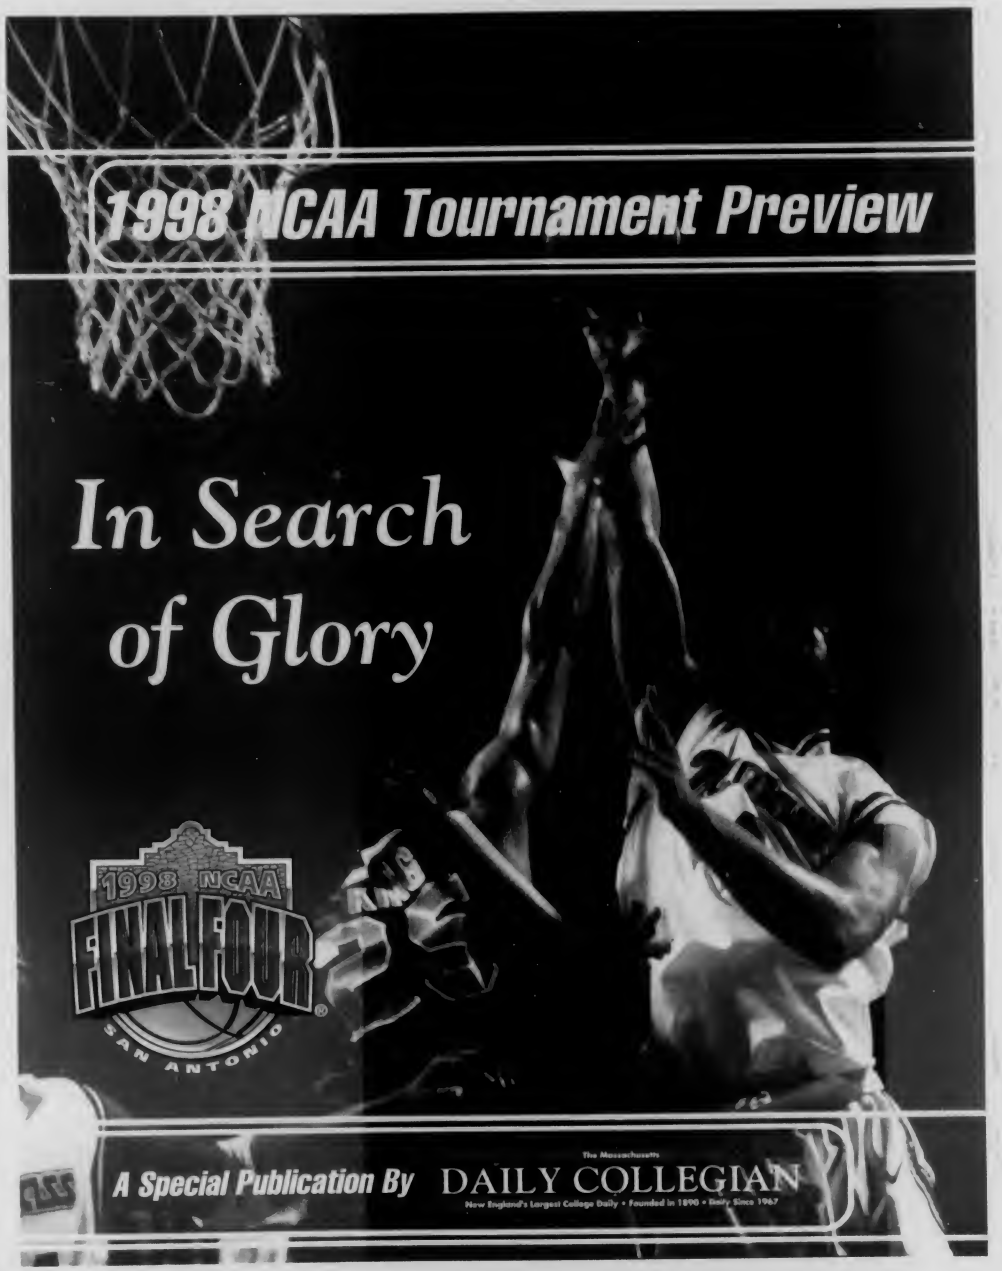
This week will provide UMass with a reference of what they need to do to beat the big teams in the west.

"We really want to see what we need to work on, so that when we get to nationals we can be more prepared for these teams than we are now," McOsker said.

This early season visit to California will help younger players like Laurie Edwards, Sarah Newell and Marcie Hupp, to get some playing time against really high quality competition.

Defensively, UMass will continue to try and frustrate opposing offenses with their front and lanes defense. Peggy Nieves has really benefited from the defensive play. The great defense has also created the offense which has been lead by a total team effort.

Katie Grogan, Claudia Clement and Hupp must continue to be a force for the team in California. They have been the major point scores for UMass. The team needed to play hard and work well together as a team to win against these west teams.



"We are also going to play against tougher and deeper teams on the west coast," Grogan said.

UMass is heading for what could be a defining week. One that could set the tone for the remainder of the season. With games against ranked opponents, UCLA, USC and San Diego St.

The key is if UMass can play the strong defense that they have been playing and force the other team to make costly turnovers, they will be successful in California.

The trip is also a large blessing for the coaching, they get to look at the teams weakness and work on the two months before nationals, when they will have to see these quality opponents again.

A year older

By Corey Peter Goodman
Collegian Sports

It was the summer of 1995, and then–Massachusetts assistant coach Bruiser Flint was looking to move on.

Following UMass' successful run to the Elite Eight, Flint was drawn to the tempting possibility that he might soon be returning home to Philadelphia.

As a finalist for the head coaching job at St. Joseph's, his alma mater, Flint was hoping to get the chance to begin a marvelous rebuilding job, not unlike the one he had crafted at UMass over seven seasons with coach John Calipari.

Thankfully for UMass, he didn't get hired.

Following the Minutemen's 1996 Final Four season, Calipari accepted a head coaching offer from the NBA's New Jersey Nets, and soon after, Flint was the man asked to take over the reigns.

"[Phil] Martelli and myself laugh about it all the time," Flint said. "He also didn't get some job the year before St. Joe's hired him. It was a step up for both of us."

However, Martelli didn't face the same obstacles Flint did from the outset. UMass had just graduated a pair of prime time starters in Dana Dingle and Donta Bright; Player of the Year Marcus Camby, who entered the NBA draft as a junior, and the University were the at the center of controversy surrounding his illegal dealings with agents.

Flint's job — an unlikely and unfair one — was to pick up the pieces, and preserve UMass' reputation as a clean program. What made this even tougher were new rumors surfacing almost every day.

"It took a year and a half before we could really move on," Flint said. "It was very difficult. For a while, we didn't know if there were going to be penalties."

This took its toll on UMass, as the Minutemen opened Flint's inaugural season with a 6–9 record. For the first time in several years, UMass was faced with the possibility that it might not make it into the NCAA tournament.

All of the critics pointed at Flint.

"I'm taking over for the best college coach in the country," Flint said. "Of course, it's going to be tough to fill his shoes. A lot of people told me I was crazy for taking the job."

Desperately looking for a connection that worked consistently, Flint implemented a three-guard offense with Charlton Clarke, Edgar Padilla and Carmelo Travieso. It worked brilliantly, and UMass went on to win 13 of its final 17 games and earned an NCAA bid.

However, UMass lost a heartbreaker to Louisville in the opening round (65–57 in Pittsburgh), which became enough motivation to come back strong this season.

"There was a bitter taste," Flint said. "It was a tough loss. It was a long season, and a lot of the guys were worn down. But we've been working towards getting back there all season."

Under Flint, UMass came out determined this season. Despite a tough opening stretch, when the Minutemen lost games to Purdue, Kansas and Fresno State, UMass regrouped and put together a mid–season 10–game win streak.

All of the country pointed towards Flint.

"That's just part of the job," Flint said. "Everyone looks at the coach. It goes with the territory."

It was during this stretch that UMass made its return to the Top 25 for the first time in over a year, much earlier, though, than most people expected.

Flint said he changed a few things from the season before, and was happy with the results.

"I've been a lot more relaxed," he said. "I sometimes beat them down to the ground. But I found it diminishes the results."

For most of the season, Flint's philosophy of "winning takes care of everything " held true. After having its five– year streak as Atlantic 10 champions snapped the year before, UMass was atop the East division once again, with huge road wins at Rhode Island and Xavier under their belts.

"It's all about experience, and playing these teams before," Flint said. "We're getting a feel for each other on the court as well."

As the wins piled up, Flint said he became more and more recognized as the head coach of UMass basketball, something, he says, is still uncomfortable to him.

"I enjoy the kids. I enjoy visiting with them," Flint said. "But when I want to go somewhere and cool out, I can't. They have certain images of you. But sometimes I just want to be Bruiser. Laugh, joke and have fun."

Flint remembers one particular incident last year in a Pittsburgh airport. A woman grabbed him from behind, and asked to take a picture with him.

"Sometimes it gets a little scary," he said.

This season, as UMass prepares for another NCAA run, Flint says he is a much more confident coach.

"The year of experience has helped," Flint said. "We know what to expect from each other now. I think that'll help us down the line."

UMass' floor general

By Luke Meredith
Collegian Sports

The point guard for the Massachusetts men's basketball team isn't your typical college basketball player. He's built like a fullback, shoots a floater most coaches would cringe at, and is never, ever at a loss for words.

UMass coach Bruiser Flint has insisted all season that he isn't even a point guard.

But he is Charlton Clarke, and lately, that's been more than enough.

After a 1996–97 season many thought should have earned UMass junior guard him Atlantic 10 Most Improved Player honors, Clarke followed with a regular season more than one coach thought should have won him the biggest prize of all — Atlantic 10 Player of the Year.

And though the award eventually went to Rhode Island's Cuttino Mobley, a late season surge by Clarke left A–10 coaches raving.

"Charlton Clarke is mentally tough, and in college basketball today, players like that come few and far between," St. Joseph's coach Phil Martelli said. "You could make an argument for him as A-10 Player of the Year, he's improved every day since he's been here."

After saving UMass' chances twice against Rhode Island, hitting a three–pointer to send the game into overtime and nailing three free throws to force a second overtime, and repeating his heroics again three days later against St. Joe's, Clarke began to build himself into a bit of legend. Fans at the St. Joe's game held signs that said "Charlton Clarke is God," a view held by senior Tyrone Weeks, who said after the game, "Thank God for Charlton Clarke."

Whether Clarke is a heavenly figure or not is up for debate, but what isn't in question is that Clarke is the heart and soul of this squad, and crucial to UMass' (21–10, 12–4) chances in the NCAA tournament, which kicks off for UMass in Atlanta Friday with a match–up against Saint Louis.

Over the last 10 games, Clarke is averaging 16.1 points and 3.9 assists, and led the team in scoring six of their last 12 games. For the season Clarke hit for 12.7 ppg and 3.7 apg, good for third–team All A–10 honors. In addition, Clarke has been the leader on the court, pulling the team together in huddles, shouting instructions, and motivating the troops with his brimstone and fire leadership. Clarke is a coach on the floor, helping his team win not just in the last five seconds — but for 40 minutes.

"I'm the leader of this team," Clarke said. " I'm [trying to] play like I don't want my season to end."

The regular season — a season that began slow, took off in January and February and has since been stuck in the mud — is over. But the recent slide isn't Clarke's doing. In fact, UMass might not even be in the NCAA tournament without Clarke's incredible play down the stretch.

The A–10 tournament ended for the second straight year with a loss to George Washington in the quarterfinals, and UMass may have to win a few games in the NCAAs to prove to fans that a 12–4 conference mark and 21 overall wins, despite the late–season slide, wasn't a disappointment.

"It's crunch time," Clarke said after the loss to the Colonials, insisting that the early exit in Philadelphia gave the Minutemen a few extra days to rest up. "If we lose, the season's over. Winning the A–10 was one of the goals we set for ourselves this season, so we're disappointed, but we'll be alright."

Clarke's play has been needed in the backcourt lately. Monty Mack and Jonathan DePina have slipped slightly at the end of the season, something Flint attributes the fatigue that comes a rookie season.

Fortunately for the Minutemen, Clarke isn't the only player playing well — Lari Ketner had a tremendous A–10 tournament. But with Tyrone Weeks battling a sprained ankle, and a crop of players such as Mack, DePina, Mike Babul and Chris Kirkland poised to see their first significant action in the NCAAs, a big part of UMass' tournament success will rest on Clarke's power forward–like shoulders.

And despite UMass' recent troubles, Clarke remains optimistic.

"We just have to keep that 'Refuse to Lose' attitude," Clarke said. "We have to show people why we're UMass, why people don't want to play us. We're best when our backs are up against the wall. We've been underdogs all year."

A PLAYERS' PERSPECTIVE

TYRONE WEEKS

While playing high school basketball in Philadelphia, I was recruited by many of the top collegiate basketball programs in the nation. Since the whole recruiting process was new to me, I wanted to pick a college where I would fit in with the system and a school that would also benefit me as a person.

By my senior year of high school, I narrowed it down to two schools: Massachusetts and Villanova.

UMass won the recruiting wars because of then-assistant, and now head coach Bruiser Flint. Bruiser is from Philly, and he and I were already good friends from family and friends we both knew. Here was a guy who I trusted and was willing to try my luck with.

Looking back on some of my favorite basketball memories, I would have to start with my first college game at UMass. I was so pumped to play. Going to the Elite Eight as a freshman was great because it made me feel like I chose the right school.

Going to the Final Four was the greatest feeling in the world, because thousands of players every year do not get to go, and most do not ever get to go. I felt so special.

My Senior Day last year was great because I was alongside my family, which I love more than anything in the world. To have them honored was terrific.

And lastly, I will never forget my first dunk. It was Senior Day on ABC against my neighborhood school, Temple. I could not have picked a better place.

Coming back for a fifth year was a big decision for me. It was a hard decision because I knew I could also make plans to do new things. But it was the right decision, because with this extra year I have opened up a lot of doors for myself for the future.

This year has been special in many ways, but the best feeling was getting my 1,000th career point at Temple in front of my hometown fans and family.

I hope this year's NCAA tournament will be a special one for me. I think we have a chance to go far if we play together and hard. If we do all the things that helped us to get this far, then we will be alright.

There are many people to whom I want to say thanks. But it would be difficult to write every person's name down.

I would like to thank all the teammates I had over my career; the coaching staff which brought me here and helped me develop my game, a special thanks also for guiding me on the right path; the administration, which has been wonderful to me over the years; and last but not least, the UMass fans who supported me through the good and bad times.

I will never forget these five years of my life.

Tyrone Weeks is a fifth-year senior, forward and captain on the Massachusetts men's basketball team.

The road to Atlanta

By Luke Meredith
Collegian Sports

Well, that was fun.

For the seventh straight season, the Massachusetts men's basketball team (21–10) extended its season with a bid to the NCAA tournament, one the Minutemen have been expecting since early February.

But for the second straight season, the bid has come via the at–large rout, following another quarterfinal loss to George Washington in the Atlantic 10 tournament.

Despite a late–season slide that left them out of the Associated Press Top 25 poll — UMass ended 27th — the Minutemen earned a No. 7 seed in the South region and will battle Conference USA member St. Louis (21–10) in the first round in the Georgia Dome Friday at 2:45 p.m. in Atlanta. The winner will face the Kentucky/South Carolina State winner, for the right to go to the Sweet Sixteen in St. Petersburg, Fla.

The road to Atlanta has been interesting, to say the least. On Feb. 18, UMass was 11–1 in the A–10, and was looking at a certain A–10 regular season title and the No. 1 seed in the A–10 tournament. But a loss to Rhode Island at home that night in double overtime — despite Charlton Clarke's heroics — meant the Minutemen would finish up the conference season 12–4. They dropped the season finale to Temple in sluggish fashion, and not only lost the No. 1 seed but a first–round bye in Philadelphia.

But it's a new season, and UMass is excited at the chance the NCAA committee gave it to turn that bad ending around, thereby giving this bunch a chance to earn its place among the best seasons in Massachusetts history. Their seed, No. 7, ranks higher than A–10 rivals Rhode Island and GW, which each earned No. 8 seeds despite better showings in the conference tournament.

UMass coach Bruiser Flint credits that in large part to UMass' philosophy of "Any Team, Any Time, Any Place", a phrase that, in UMass' case, has become much more than a moniker to stick on the annual poster. Students may not think playing only 10 of 31 games at home is all that great, but Flint feels it helped his team get a higher seed.

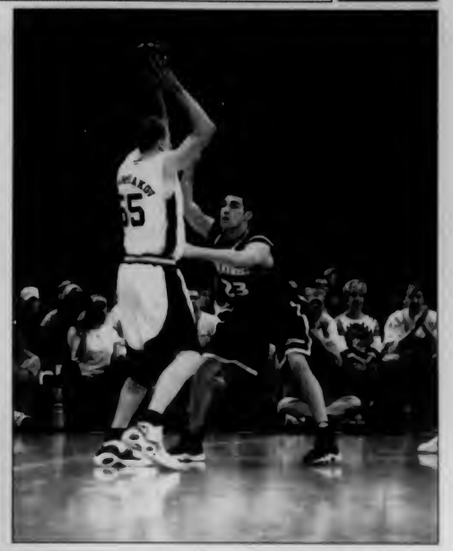
"One of the things that really helped us is that we only played 10 home games," Flint said. "The selection show was talking about teams that play on the road [having an advantage], and we've been on the road a lot. We played 31 games, and only 10 were at home, so I think we were rewarded at bit for that."

The bulk of the road games occurred early in the season. UMass played 11 of its first 13 games on the road, including trips to Cleveland, Alaska, Kansas and Las Vegas. It took a little time, but the Minutemen found themselves on the road, and when they returned home to face George Washington on Jan. 10, they were running on all cylinders. They trounced the Colonials, 79–48, before a raucous William D. Mullins Center, and won 11 of their next 12 games. With an AP ranking that reached as high as No. 18, and 11 NCAA opponents on their schedule, the Minutemen were confident they'd get a bid.

Massachusetts has become a fixture at the NCAA tournament, and the players are excited at the chance to go further than last year's 65–57 first–round loss to Louisville. Flint, for one, scoffed at the theory that it helped UMass not to have to play in a No. 8–No. 9 game, with the winner having to play a No. 1 in the second round.

"When you get in the NCAA tournament, there are no games to avoid," Flint said. "You want to be in it. You don't care what seed you are, as long as you're in there. That's all that counts."

The bracket UMass resides in for the first two rounds looks to be among the toughest in this year's field. The No. 2 is Kentucky, a team UMass has lost to twice in NCAA play. In 1992, UMass stormed back from an early deficit only to lose to the Wildcats 87–77 in the East Regionals, UMass' first appearance there in 30 years. Kentucky then lost to Duke in the East finals, on a last–second shot from Duke Center Christian Laettner, in what is widely regarded as one of the greatest games in college basketball history.



In 1996, Kentucky ended the Minutemen's dream season in the Final Four, 81–74. A few months before scandal would taint the 1996 season, Marcus Camby, John Calipari, Donta Bright et al. gave it a valiant effort, but the Wildcats and their intense pressure brand of play would land them an NCAA title two nights later over Syracuse.

Other big–name programs include No. 6 UCLA, which won the national title In 1995, and No. 3 Michigan, which made it to the championship game in 1992 and 1993. All in all, the 16 teams in the South bracket have made it to nine Final Fours in the 90s, and the regions boasts four national champions — No. 1 seed Duke in 1991 and 1992, UCLA in 1995 and Kentucky 1996.

GW makes an appearance as the No. 8 seed in the bracket's other site — Lexington, Ky.

The Minutemen didn't seem too concerned with what is ahead of them. After slipping late, Massachusetts just hopes it can write a happy ending to the season, and use its chance at redemption to prove to the college basketball world that UMass basketball is alive and well.

"I didn't care what seed we got," sophomore center/forward Ajmal Basit said. "Once you get in, anything can happen. We're just going to go in and try to have some great games and win."

Underdogs abound at tourney time

By Casey Kane
Collegian Sports

Underdogs? Fans love 'em. Top seeds four 'em. And office pool entrants live and die by 'em.

And like it or not, they are an intrinsic part of the NCAA tournament fabric. Following are the Collegian's picks for the Top 10 Underdogs to Watch Out For:

(note: No. 7 seeds and lower were in consideration)

1. Temple: The No. 7 seed in the West could cause some trouble for the Bearcats if the two teams are to meet each other in the second round. Not only do the Owls play perhaps the nation's most formidable matchup zone defense, they also feature one of the country's best defenders in sophomore guard Pepe Sanchez.

2. Florida State: The Seminoles boast one of the

You may need a road map in order to follow the road to the Final Four this year. Sixty-four teams received invitations, but only four will waltz their way into San Antonio, Texas come March 28.

And only one will be left standing two days later.

But before a new (or possibly defending) champion can be crowned, 64 teams must duke it out for the privilege of a weekend deep in the heart of Texas.

East regional

In the East Regional North Carolina sewed up the No. 1 seed with its win over Duke in the Atlantic Coast Conference tournament final. Don't feel too bad for the Tar Heels — even though they have to go to Hartford for their first-round matchup — they shouldn't run into trouble until the regional semifinal, where they could face usually tough Princeton or upstart UNLV.

Connecticut can't play at the Hartford Civic Center because the school is hosting that regional, so instead the Huskies, who grabbed a No. 2 seed, will play in Washington, D.C.

South Carolina, a team looking to avenge its first-round exit last year, is the No. 3 seed. The always-good-for-a- soundbite Bob Knight graces the East as the No. 7 seed, and there should be a good No. 6-No. 11 matchup when Xavier takes on the Washington Huskies.

The No. 8-No. 9 game in the East bracket features a pair of hyphenated schools, North Carolina-Charlotte and Illinois-Chicago.

South regional

Duke, meanwhile, claimed the No. 1 spot in the South. The Blue Devils face Radford in the first round, and could potentially square off against Atlantic 10 representative George Washington in the second round. GW fell to Xavier in the conference tournament finals.

Syracuse and New Mexico round out the top half of the South regional, which will be played in Lexington, Kent.

Kentucky picked up the second seed in the South and will travel to Atlanta for the first round. UCLA and Michigan, a team featuring hot-handed Louis Bullock, also highlight that side of the bracket.

Massachusetts will head south to Georgia as well, where the Minutemen will meet Saint Louis in a first-round tilt. Freshman Larry Hughes will lead Charlie Spoonhour's Billikens into battle against Bruiser Flint's troops Friday at 2:45 p.m.

ment regions stack up

Arizona, the defending king, holds the first seed in the West Region and the Wildcats will face Nicholls State in the first round in Sacramento. Both Lon Kruger's Illinois squad and Kevin Stallings' Illinois State team are also headed for California, but the teams wouldn't do a regional battle until the regional semifinal in Anaheim, Calif.

In the bottom half of the West Region, Boise, Idaho will play host to No. 2 seed Cincinnati and the Bearcats' opponent, Northern Arizona. The winner of that game could meet John Chaney and Temple's vaunted zone defense. The Owls meet West Virginia in their opener.

Rick Majerus' troops earned the No. 3 West seed and a trip to potato country, where the Utes will take on San Francisco in the Dons' first tourney appearance since the field was expanded to 64 teams.

Midwest regional

Kansas, which already has over 30 wins, locked up the top seed in the Midwest Region and a game in Oklahoma City, with a Big 12 tournament victory. The Jayhawks have the easiest of the first-round matchups — Prairie View A&M, a school that recorded fewer than 10 wins over Division I opponents this season.

Purdue, which fell in the inaugural Big 10 tournament to Michigan, received the No. 2 seed and will play in Chicago. It faces a potential second-round game against St. John's, which is finally coming into its own. Of course both have to win their early games in order to advance.

Perhaps the team with the best draw out of the Midwest is Clemson. A No. 4 seed out of the ACC, the Tigers have the capabilities to wreak some havoc with the higher seeds and possibly head to Texas.

Stanford, which started hot this season with an 18-0 mark, took the Midwest No. 3 and faces College of Charleston in the opener.

In the upper half of the bracket, Bryce and Homer Drew will give it one more go as Valparaiso squares off against Ole Miss in the first round.

Any way you slice it there is no clear cut choice for the crown. Each team faces stiffer competition in each successive round until the Russian roulette battle for a title draws to a close on March 30.

This is why they call it Madness.

toughest schedules in the country because they play in the nation's best league, the Atlantic Coast Conference. Add on top of that out of conference games against Arizona and Connecticut and FSU is literally prepared for just about anything.

3. Valparaiso: The No. 13 seed Crusaders have one of the most famous father-son combinations in NCAA tournament history in coach Homer and Bryce Drew. Bryce is one of five seniors on the Valpo roster, and the All-America candidate won't go down without a fight.

4. UNLV: Could there be a team in the tournament with more upset potential than UNLV? Making their first appearance in the Big Dance since they went to the Final Four in 1991, Bill Bayno's Runnin' Rebels pulled off three big wins in a row to earn an automatic bid. Bayno just has to hope there's more

Reaching new heights

By Corey Peter Goodman
Collegian Sports

Charlton Clarke, Monty Mack and Lari Ketner are considered the Massachusetts men's basketball team's top performers heading into its seventh consecutive NCAA tournament appearance.

But who can deny the value of Chris Kirkland, the team's most athletic and spirited player?

Not Massachusetts coach Bruiser Flint.

"He's been a spark for us all year long," Flint said.

After a subpar freshmen season, last year, Kirkland gained a bit of celebrity status this season among the William D. Mullins Center faithful, as a sure commodity off the pine with his enthusiasm on the hard wood.

But it was last year when UMass' most versatile player was not so sure about his future in Amherst.

He described it as an empty feeling, like he wasn't a real part of the team, and Kirkland said it started well before last season began.

As a highly-touted high school product at Sto Rox, where he averaged 25.9 points and 13.1 rebounds during his senior year, Kirkland was recruited by North Carolina coach Dean Smith and hometown schools Duquesne and Pitt.

But it was then-Massachusetts coach John Calipari and assistant coach John Robic, during the Final Four year in 1996, who convinced Kirkland that he could flourish in the UMass system that would soon graduate small forward bookends Donta Bright and Dana Dingle.

However, following the news that Calipari had accepted the head coaching job with the NBA's New Jersey Nets, Kirkland doubted that UMass still wanted him.

"He [Calipari] never called me," Kirkland said. "I was upset. He told me personally that he would stay [at UMass]. I just hoped things wouldn't change."

Unfortunately, it seemed they had. As the season wore on, Kirkland appeared as just another face on the bench. Widely considered the least effective of the freshmen forward trio that included Mike Babul and Winston Smith, Kirkland didn't see action in 14 of his team's 33 games. In 10 others, he played five minutes or less.

"It kind of demoralizes you," he said. "The team isn't winning, and I'm thinking 'maybe I should get a chance.' That's what I was thinking."

UMass' season ended, ironically, in Pittsburgh during the first round of the NCAA tournament. With his family and friends in attendance, Kirkland played less than a minute in a disappointing 65–57 loss to Louisville.

Upon arriving back in Amherst, Kirkland admitted it was difficult to move on and focus on next season. But following a visit with Flint, Kirkland decided to put the effort in.

"I gave an ultimatum to a lot of the guys. You either work hard, or you won't be here," Flint said. "He responded to it. He really stuck with it. He improved a lot, and got stronger."

This season, the commitment is paying off big-time for Kirkland and UMass. After scoring only four points in UMass' first 12 games, Kirkland is averaging nearly six points per game and over three rebounds since.

Kirkland's biggest game came against La Salle (Feb. 14), when the sophomore put up 13 points and 10 rebounds, both career-highs.

However, Kirkland's toughest assignment came last week against Virginia Tech in the opening round of the Atlantic 10 tournament. With Tyrone Weeks out of the lineup, Kirkland (6-foot-6, 206 pounds) was asked to back up Basit at power forward in addition to his duties at small forward.

Kirkland responded with 30 minutes of steady basketball, in which he committed only one foul while scoring seven points and grabbing six rebounds.

"I like the four [power forward] better," Kirkland confessed. "I haven't told coach, but it gets me started up. I go harder, because I know I have to play against bigger guys."

This was a lesson taught to him by another big guy, former Massachusetts center Inus Norville, who banged with Kirkland during practice last season. Norville, said Kirkland, encouraged him to work harder even when the minutes were limited and the team was doing poorly.

"When I was down, he said 'work for yourself,'" Kirkland said. "I had a bad attitude. He helped me see that. He said 'keep working harder, then they'll have to play you because you'll get better.'"

Another inspiration, Kirkland said, is brother James who led California (Pa.) to the Division II Final Four when Kirkland was a child.

"I always wanted to play ball because of him," Kirkland said. "I grew up watching him play. He pushed me a lot in high school. He hoped I'd get to play Division I someday."

As the team now prepares for the NCAAs, Kirkland can be assured that — unlike last season — he will be one of the first guys off the bench providing the boost he says is just part of "UMass Basketball."

"I want to go twice as hard, jump twice as high," he said. "I want to spark the guys, even if it's for only a minute or two."

"I want the country to see UMass diving on the floor, scrapping and fighting for the ball. That's what UMass basketball is about."

breaking through

By Jackie Leroux & Kathleen Ralls
Collegian Staff

Three short months ago just about everyone had written the Massachusetts women's basketball team off.

The Minutewomen had been struck with the left knee ACL spell, a disease that is spreading across the courts of America, and it didn't look as though they could reverse their uncanny bad luck.

The team's highest scorer, pre-season second team Atlantic 10 All Conference pick Kelly Van Huisen, a sophomore guard, fell on Dec. 7 with 11 seconds left against Holy Cross. Her knee was deemed impossible to play on and she has been forced to sit out the season.

Junior forward Jaywana Bradley injured her knee during the summer and had to settle for a seat on the sideline as well. Junior forward Tez Kraft was in the process of making an eventually successful comeback after rehabilitating her own knee.

The team was left to mend on its own without three key players. The months of December and January were bleak for the Minutewomen as they were trapped in a dark spiral, going 3-6, unable to lift themselves out of the slump.

But somehow the coach Joanie O'Brien ignited a spark in her team. Feeling out the lineups, she settled on one which mixed senior experience with freshmen jitters. And the team responded with new-found determination and manufactured a whole new reel of highlights and milestones of its season.

With a 58-56 win over Virginia Tech on Jan. 4, O'Brien became the UMass all-time winningest women's basketball coach with 93 victories, surpassing Mary Ann Ozardarski's former record of 92. She also reached the century mark by defeating Fordham on Feb. 12.

But the accolades were not bestowed on the coach alone.

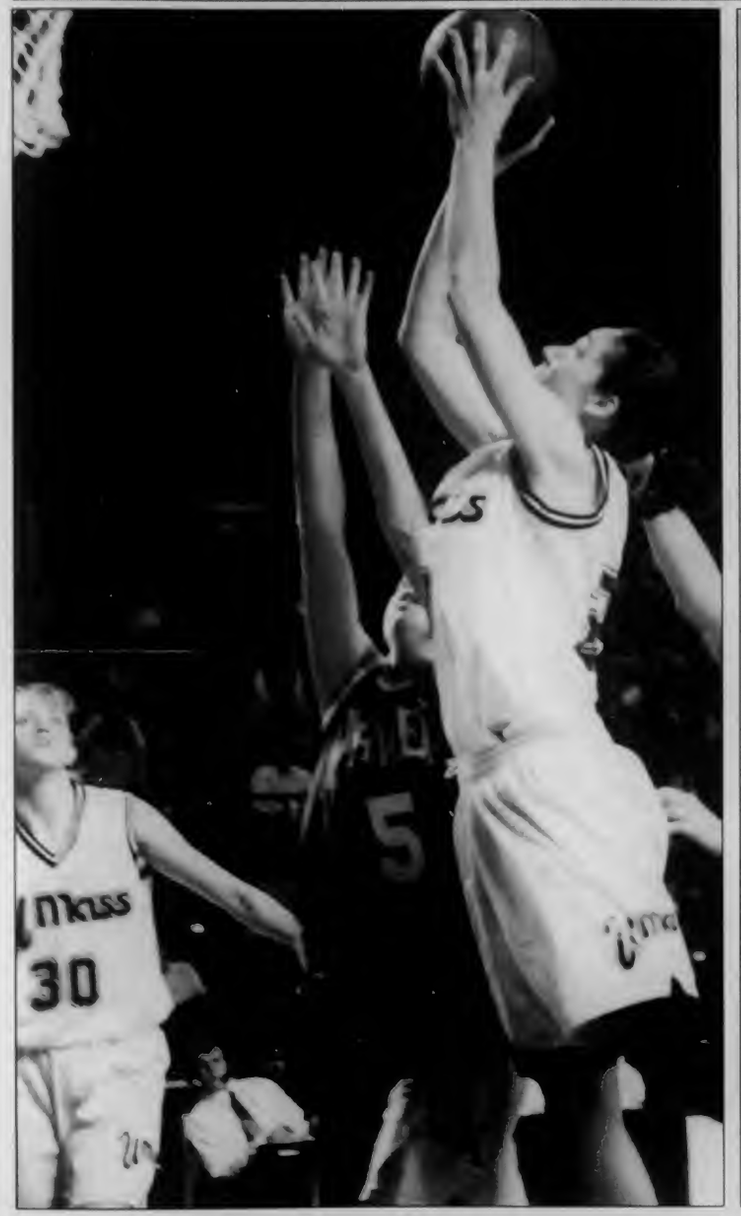
Senior co-captain Sabriya Mitchell surpassed Christel Zullo's former mark of 533 career assists on February 19 with her first assist in their matchup with A-10 rival George Washington. Mitchell has increased her stock to a current 567. As a result, she was named to the A-10 second team All-Conference.

Kraft, the team's most consistent scorer on the year, was selected to the A-10's third team All-Conference while averaging just over 13 points per game. She was also named to the A-10 All-Tournament team as well as being honored as the 1998 A-10 tournament MVP.

While the Minutewomen were well represented as individuals, the team heated up in February to finish out their regular season on a seven-game winning streak which included going undefeated during the month of February.

On Feb. 14, UMass defeated St. Joseph's, 55-46, in Philadelphia for the first time in Massachusetts history.

Five days later, the top team in the A-10 West, George Washington, came to the William D. Mullins Center. UMass harassed the "Spanish Connection" of Noelia Gomez and Elisa Aguilar to beat the Colonials, 68-55. Freshman Kathy Coyner, who has been coming on as of late, recorded a career-high 22 points while Kraft also reached a career-high with 25 points which included three three-pointers. With that win, the Minutewomen had positioned themselves for a tie in the A-10 East.



They clinched the crown two days later with the 63-54 trouncing of St. Bonaventure. They had never finished in first place before.

In the A-10 tournament, UMass' first task to take on the nation's second leading scorer (27.4 ppg), Korie Hlede of Duquesne. UMass focused on Hlede and stunted the rest of her team to win, 63-47. The Minutewomen defeated Xavier, 49-44, to make their inaugural trip to the A-10 finals where they lost to Virginia Tech.

The Hokies thus had earned the automatic bid into the NCAA tournament and UMass would have to wait for the selection committees decision. It was supposed that either GW or UMass would earn the at-large bid. Both teams were chosen by NCAA committee, proving how strong the A-10 is.

Now the No. 13 Minutewomen are heading to Iowa City to play the No. 4 seed Iowa (17-10).

5. Illinois State: Two words: Rico Hill. The man is big, at least he plays like he's big. And good. And with that weapon in his pocket coach Kevin Stallings could surprise a few people. The Red Birds, seeded No. 9 in the West where they will meet Jerry Green's Tennessee team in a first-round tilt, have a deep bench and reasonable talent. So a first round win is not improbable.

6. St. John's: The Midwest No. 7 seeded Red Storm will face Detroit in the first round in Chicago, and the matchup could prove to be a big challenge for the Titans. When Felipe Lopez was about to enter his freshman year Sports Illustrated put the talented recruit on its cover. The pressure of expectations dwarfed Lopez and Co.'s accomplishments. This year, however, people have finally given the Red Storm the respect it deserves. At least some people have. The others may have to witness St. John's firsthand.

7. St. Louis: Freshman Larry Hughes is good. Real good. And unfortunately for Massachusetts fans, he and the No. 10 Billikens square off against the Minutemen in Atlanta in opening round action. Of course, UMass brings a talented bunch to the table, but it can't count its chickens...

8. Eastern Michigan: Illinois State may have Rico Hill, a bruising big man, but No. 13 seed Eastern Michigan (East) have a small guy, Earl Boykins. One of the most impressive small guys in the game, Boykins can turn a game on its head with his near 20 points per game average and over 80 percent at the foul line.

9. Iona: the Gaels, who earned the No. 12 seed in the South, face Syracuse in the first round. Kashif Hameed is an Iona standout who is also a talented saxophone player (eat your heart out, drum major Vince Carter).

10. Washington: It probably won't happen, but the Huskies could give Xavier a run for its money in the first round.

South African spies miss the plane in heist

CAPE TOWN, South Africa (AP) —Two South African intelligence agents, eager to make a quick fortune, thought they had the perfect crime.

They had learned last May that four generals fleeing the collapsing Zairean dictatorship of Mobutu Sese Seko were flying to South Africa in a plane apparently loaded with looted cash, diamonds and gold bars.

The two spies waited for the Zaireans to land, hoping to loot the looters.

But one detail was wrong. While they were staking out Johannesburg's main airport, the plane was touching down at the city's much smaller Lansena airstrip.

"It was like something you see in a James Bond 007 film," said Nosiviwe Mapisa-Nqakula, head of a parliamentary committee on Intelligence Services, which revealed the bungled heist yesterday. The two junior National Intelligence Agency officials confessed to their attempted crime while Nqakula's committee was investigating allegations that South Africa's intelligence services were helping former leaders of Mobutu's regime.

No evidence that girls do better in segregated classes

WASHINGTON (AP) — A women's group that backed experiments with separate-sex education in public schools said yesterday it has found no conclusive evidence that girls perform better academically without boys in the classroom.

The group suggested that efforts to improve learning while ending bias focus more on regular, coed classes and teacher training.

Almost all the research examined by the American Association of University Women looked at private schools, Catholic schools and public schools in other countries — not at the scattered American public schools where experiments in single-sex schools or classrooms are taking place. Because of the lack of hard data, the group urged more study.

Earlier complaints by the AAUW and others about bias against girls in education helped start those experiments in California, Illinois, Maine, New Hampshire, New York and Virginia.

"What the research shows is that separating by sex is not the solution to gender inequity in education," said Maggie Ford, president of the Washington-based group's education arm. "When elements of a good education are present, girls and boys succeed." The group said gender stereotyping occurs in single-sex education as well as coeducation. "Sound teacher training is the key" to ending such bias, said Sandy Bernard, president of the AAUW.

Senators disagree over appointment; race issue sparked

By Jill Carroll
Collegian Staff

Controversy once again arose during a heated debate between two senators after the University of Massachusetts Student Government Association (SGA) meeting Wednesday night.

In the wake of controversy over a failed proposal to place a motion on the meeting's agenda, Senator Robert Chirwa who had been opposed to placing the motion on the agenda, argued with Senator Marielly Troncoso, who was in favor of placing the motion on the agenda, when Troncoso allegedly brought up the issue of race.

"It is time for you to look in the mirror and check your color and stop fronting," Troncoso said.

Chirwa, who is the only person of color in the Pro-student caucus, felt this comment was said because he does not generally affiliate with the Asian Latino African Native American (ALANA) caucus and considered it a "malicious attack" on his character.

"Yes, I am a person of color but there are no words to describe the anguish, humiliation and hurt pride that descended upon me at the precise moment," Chirwa said in a written statement.

"I felt that since I did not fit into her persona of the average minority I was considered a sellout. I consider it a personal attack on my personal character," Chirwa later said.

Troncoso had no comment concerning the remark.

The proposal was to place a motion on the agenda that would recommend the appointment of Frank Mullen to the judiciary committee.

The debate was sparked over concerns that Mullen would be in favor of petitions currently going through the judicary that call for the recent SGA elections to be nullified.

The senate was divided into two factions over placing this motion on the agenda.

Some senators wanted it to be placed on the agenda to ensure quorum at judicial meetings and therefore the functioning of the judicial arm.

Senator Jodi Bailey (Commuter Area at-large) was in support of the motion and pointed out why supporters wanted the motion to be placed on the agenda.

"There are so many petitions that need to go through the judiciary, it's actually causing the SGA not to function," Bailey said.

Bailey explained why supporters of the proposal to place the motion on the agenda were upset.

"Everyone was so mad because [the senators] wouldn't even let the motion be put on the agenda," Bailey said.

Other senators were opposed to placing the motion on the agenda because they felt the appointment was an attempt to "stack" the senate in favor of nullifying the elections.

"It looked like a blatant attempt to stack the judicary," said President-elect Amy Pellegrino.

Pellegrino described the disagreement as a result of the tension over the election results.

"[For voting to abstain] three senators came over and screamed at me," Pellegrino said.

Because the motion was not placed on the agenda, the appointment was never debated or voted on.

UM sophomore remembered; funeral to be held Saturday

University of Massachusetts sophomore Andrew B. Sala, 19, of 117 Providence Road, Mendon, died suddenly Tuesday morning from injuries sustained in a fall at Cashin Residence Hall in Sylvan Residential Area.

Sala, who lived on the fifth floor, was a member of Lambda Chi Alpha Fraternity.

He was born on June 11, 1978 in Framingham. He resided in Mendon for most of his life. A 1996 graduate of Nipmuc Regional High School in Mendon, Sala graduated with honors.

As a freshman at UMass, he was majoring in chemical engineering but was in the process of changing his major to business management this year.

Sala enjoyed playing soccer during his high school career and also worked as a camp counselor during the summer months at the Soccer Scene in Northboro. In addition, he was a licensed soccer referee for the Youth Soccer League for the past six years in Mendon.

Last summer, Sala was employed at Waters Associates in Taunton where he worked in the chemical engineering department.

Sala is survived by his mother Nancy (Browne) Sala, his father Albert Sala, his brother Gregory Sala, maternal grandparents Walter and Helen (Lucek) Browne of Milford, and many aunts, uncles and cousins. He was also the grandson of the late Albert and Josephine (Gesa) Sala, formerly of Milford.

Visiting hours will be held today from 4–7 p.m. at the Edwards Funeral Home, 44 Congress St., Milford. His funeral will be held Saturday at 10 a.m. at St. Michael's Church on North Avenue in Mendon. Burial will follow in the Swandale Cemetery on Hartford Avenue in Mendon.

In lieu of flowers, donations in Sala's memory may be made to the Andrew B. Sala Memorial Scholarship Fund, c/o the Milford Federal Savings & Loan Association, 246 Main St., Milford MA 01757.

Faculty discusses UM summit and fee freeze

By Victoria Groves
Collegian Staff

The Faculty Senate discussed budget increases and investments at their last meeting before Spring Break yesterday at the University of Massachusetts.

Recently, at the UMass Summit held at UMass Worcester, a system wide meeting on administrative restructuring and design, Chancellor David K. Scott presented "10 stubborn irreducible facts" for an integrative university.

Three hundred and seventy-five representatives from all five UMass campuses were present; representing all levels of faculty and staff.

"People were stunned because he was delivering a very tough message if we continue to operate the same way we have we will reach the point where we have to move 300 [staff and faculty]. That is if there is no increase in the budget," said Joseph Larson, Director of the Environmental Institute at UMass.

Scott's points included "continuing a philosophy of creating winners, rather than increasing sophistication at selecting pre-determined winners (higher SAT's) with the necessary attendant resources (human and financial)" and "gaining release from oppressive state restrictions that consume significant resources in complying."

The purpose of the Summit was for members of all five universities to come together to discuss the external and internal challenges facing the UMass system in the future and how to build agreement and work together.

Taiwan policy attacked by China; foreign minister calls for peace

BEIJING (AP) — China's foreign minister accused Taiwan yesterday of backing away from the policy of "one China" and accused it of using the Asian financial crisis to its own advantage.

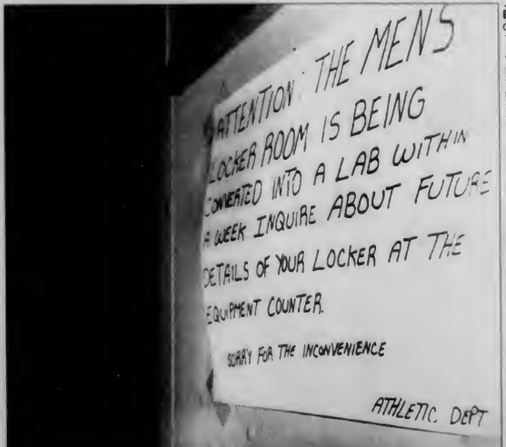
Qian Qichen said China wants to start political talks and officially end hostilities as the first step toward reunifying China with the island it claims as a renegade province.

Qian said the "one China" principle means "thee is one China in the world and Taiwan is part of China."

He said Taiwanese officials "used to support this principle and now they seem to have backed down."

Qian, speaking at his annual news conference coinciding with the yearly session of the National People's Congress, also criticized Taiwanese officials for traveling to Asian countries that are suffering from financial crises or receiving representatives from those countries.

Qian accused Taiwan of trying to profit from the Asian financial crisis and use it to serve political purposes.



Taiwan called Qian's remarks an attempt to turn the region's struggling economies away from increased contacts with Taiwan.

"Our leaders visits are purely motivated by good faith. I wish the Chinese communist authorities would refrain from viewing every single action on our part with prejudice," government spokesman Chen Chien-jen told reporters.

Taiwanese leaders travel the region to learn the dangers facing Taiwanese investors, and evaluate the need for aid to those countries, Chen said.

Athletes upset over Totman locker assignments

BRIAN MCDERMOTT · COLLEGIAN

The locker room in Totman Gym.

By Jason Eiseman
Collegian Staff

If you go to Totman Gym, to where the women's locker room used to be, you will find a lot of junk lying around. It looks like there was some construction done, but not much. About a year ago, all the women who had lockers there were moved somewhere else, and the space was supposed to be used for an exercise science laboratory.

On Feb. 25, signs appeared in the men's locker room notifying athletes that they would have to move from their half-lockers to much smaller basket lockers. They were told to have their supplies moved out within a week. Some students did not have time to move their things, and Totman employee opened about 120 lockers, and moved the contents to the basket type lockers themselves.

Now, students are upset about being forced to move their lockers on such short notice, and Space Management and the Athletic Department are pointing fingers at each other.

Jim Patulak, Associate Athletic Director, said he knew there was going to be construction, but was not informed of the plan to use the men's locker rooms until days before he had put up signs notifying students.

Patulak said a year ago a plan was enacted to clear out the women's locker room, and said the plan to use the men's locker room was never checked by the Athletic Department.

"That was done without any consultation with the athletic department," Patulak said. "This all changed without our knowledge."

Associate Chancellor Beverly Wood, from space management said it was up to the athletic department to make sure those lockers were cleared out, and they had enough time to move students out.

"This has been planned for a long time," Wood said. "That's the responsibility of the athletic department, they manage the locker rooms."

Jeff Quackenbush works for Facilities Planning, and is the project manager for the construction at Totman. He said Space Management is right, and the athletic department did not move the students out early enough.

"He [Patulak] was aware that he had to get people out of that locker room at the end of the semester," Quackenbush said. Quackenbush said Patulak knew construction was supposed to have started already on the men's locker room, several months ago. He said construction will start over spring break.

Quackenbush said had trouble contacting Patulak, that Patulak would not return his phone calls or respond to his letters.

"I can appreciate that he was in a hard spot, trying to get those people out of that locker room," Quackenbush said.

No matter who blames who, the issue still remains that many students with lockers at Totman were moved out of their lockers on about one weeks notice.

Scott Jason is a senior economics major, and member of the men's crew team. He has already ben moved to a much smaller locker.

"That was kind of a bummer," Jason said. "I wish they'd given us a little more warning. I just hope they can find arrangements for us." He said the basket lockers were difficult to use, and could not carry as many supplies as the larger ones.

Chris Knight has a locker at Totman, and was moved to a small basket locker, but does not mind. Knight is a graduate student in the exercise science department.

"The people moving up here from Boyden [Gym], it's probably the best thing that's ever happened to our program," Knight said. "It makes a big difference when everyone's in the same building." Knight said the he understands why some people are upset at being moved out of their lockers, but it all depends on where people's priorities lie.

"This is a huge step for us," Knight said. "I know what's more important for me, and it's not locker space."

It's not only undergraduates who are upset over the issues of the lockers at Totman. David Kim is an Associate Professor of mechanical industrial engineering, who also has a locker at Totman. He said he is not happy with the size of the new lockers, but he doesn't think anything can be done about it.

"It's pretty bad," Kim said. "I paid my fee expecting to get a locker for the year , and then get booted out mid-way through the semester."

professor, expressed his concern that many people at the university feel that there is an excess of money "floating" around Whitmore Administration Building.

"A lot of people think that because of the legislative increase to the budget that there's lots of money floating around. There's an incredible amount of naivety... that we're making all kinds of strides. Unless we continue to invest we're going to go backwards," O'Connor said.

"No one knows what the last word in budgets is going to be," said Presiding Officer Ernest May, chairman of the Music and Dance department.

Also discussed were the recent fee freezes which will take place for in-state students.

"The freezing of fees is likely to have a major impact on students; health services may have to close evenings... what steps are being taken to identify these impacts?" Larson asked.

According to Thomas Robinson, Vice Chancellor for Student Affairs, the freeze has the potential of causing some serious problems.

"The freezing of fees impacts Housing Services and Housing Services... to meet additional contract commitments, the loss of fees is a serious problem. The flipside is trying to subsidize programs in other ways which will present other problems," Robinson said.

According to Robinson, the Board of Higher Education has been considering designating fees as part of tuition. Tuition paid to UMass goes to directly to the state of Massachusetts.

Spirituality the focus of residential program

By Jason Trenkle
Collegian Staff

The Orchard Hill/Central Residential Area Life program hosted an International Spirituality workshop Wednesday night in Field Residence Hall classroom, in conjunction with the month long "Mind, Body, and Soul" project.

The workshop consisted of sharing experiences, poetry readings, and music that inspired individuals and provided an example of how students come to accept their inner spirituality.

Some students defined internal spirituality as how well someone is in tune with themselves. There was a general agreement among the spectators that in order to achieve that inner spirituality, an individual must be able to arrive at an understanding of who they are and what moves them.

Within the group, students assumed that every student's inner spirituality is affected in common ways. The goal of the evening was to reach an understanding of how students at college age are affected.

Student Stephanie Yellin felt the event was a great success because "as students, we are often going through the same types of experiences in hopes of finding answers to the questions of who we are and where we're going."

Student Allana Todman highlighted the evening when she shared her experiences and how it affected her internal self. She explained her experience at the University of Massachusetts and the difficulties she went through in expressing her talents. She learned in order to have her abilities recognized, she had to first understand her internal self to be able to recognize that she possessed special talent.

When she reached internal spiritual awareness, she became a success, and now her story is one of the many that students are inspiring to follow in the internal spiritual process.

Todman encouraged others to share in their experiences by asking individuals to represent their "soul searching" process by the curvature of a line. Other members in the group would follow along the line to experience and understand how different people find "the right path" to their lives.

Upcoming events being organized in the Orchard Hill/Central Residential Department on "Mind, Body, and Soul" include a drum circle at VanMeter Residence Hall following the week of Spring Break. For more information on the events around your area, contact your residential cluster area.

Harvard professor speaks on race, class

KEN MC DONALD \ COLLEGIAN

William Julius Wilson spoke yesterday on the American class system.

By Laura Jakutowicz
Collegian Correspondent

Time magazine rated him one of America's most influential people. Former University of Massachusetts professor, now Harvard professor and nationally renowned author, William Julius Wilson, expert on race, poverty, urban policy and the role of class in American society.

Wilson spoke at Bowker Auditorium yesterday as the inaugural speech for the University's new Public Policy Lecture Series. Themes of joblessness in the inner cities, particularly in Chicago among inner city blacks were the focus of the speech. He reminded the almost full house of prominent onlookers, including C-Span and University and community members that the social ramifications of joblessness and unemployment result in the lack of stable family values and routine daily habits.

"Regular employment determines where you're going to be and when you're going to be there. In the absence of regular employment, life, including family life, becomes less coherent," Wilson said.

He went on to say that children who are raised in neighborhoods with routine work ethics tend to grow up with a stronger sense of their own labor force attachment. Without this opportunity to exist within a disciplined, working atmosphere, children do not have the ability to model themselves as future breadwinners in a mainstream workforce setting.

Wilson suggested that structural factors, and not strictly racial segregation are the fault of reduced workforce participation of inner city blacks. Wilson cited "the disappearance of work in many inner city neighborhoods is in part related to the nationwide decline in low-skilled workers. It has had an adverse effect on blacks because a substantially larger proportion of African-Americans are unskilled."

Structuralized ghetto isolation is a major factor in determining why so many blacks are without work.

Another mentioned explanation for the lack of jobs in inner cities is the trend of firms and industries, once located in the inner cities, to move out into the suburbs, making it more difficult for inner city blacks to find and afford transportation there. The computer revolution was also mentioned as a possible hindrance for inner city blacks to obtain jobs with more and more jobs requiring computer skills.

The remaining jobs in the inner cities are often made more difficult for blacks to obtain because of employers screening out inner city blacks due to their supposed lack of the desired reading, speaking and writing skills deemed proper for the jobs. Wilson raised the question, how are these blacks to develop these "soft skills" when they are shaped in a harsh environment? Children raised in isolated ghettos, learn not to make eye to eye contact, and also tend to take on a tough demeanor, all of which are "ineffective in promoting the welfare of the children [in becoming mainstream workforce employees]" Wilson said.

To alleviate the problem, Wilson asserts that "public jobs need to be created in order for inner city blacks to learn acceptable job skills." Strengthening the Welfare Reform Bill, by adding more programs with mayors, using public and private sector initiatives to provide jobs in the inner cities, is a step in the right direction, Wilson said.

U.N. debates abortion funds

By Tom Raum
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — U.N. chief Kofi Annan cautioned yesterday that the United States could lose its voting rights in the U.N. General Assembly if an abortion dispute continues to hold up long-delinquent U.S. payments. He pledged that "not a cent" of the money would be used to promote abortions.

Republican congressional leaders said they would press ahead to try to link abortion restrictions to money to pay the arrears, even as Democratic leaders predicted they could round up enough votes to sustain a veto threatened by President Clinton.

The long-simmering dispute also separately jeopardizes new funds for the International Monetary Fund to help ease the Asian financial crisis.

Annan, wrapping up a two-day visit, warned that the United States may have its General Assembly voting rights suspended if it doesn't soon pay a $600 million installment of back dues. The U.S. position in the Security Council, where it holds veto power, would be unaffected.

U.S. arrears are as high as $1.3 billion.

"I'm sure the U.S. government... nor the people of America would want to be in a situation where the United States loses its vote in the U.N. because of lack of payment," Annan said in remarks at the National Press Club.

In his visit, the secretary-general talked to President Clinton and a group of lawmakers about separating dues from the congressional fight over abortion.

Clinton has said he will veto legislation sent to him that includes abortion restrictions — even if it delays the IMF money or the back payments to the United Nations.

Democratic leaders in both chambers predicted yesterday they could assemble enough votes to sustain the veto. Senate Minority Leader Tom Daschle, (D-S.D.), even predicted some votes against the measure would come "from conservatives and from some others who hold the view that I have: that we ought to pay our bills."

Legislation authorizing the back U.N. dues as well as keeping in place a variety of State Department programs and providing for a reorganization of the foreign-policy bureaucracy had been scheduled for a House vote yesterday.

Republican members showed divisions on how large the U.N. payments should be. Leaders insisted, however, that solid support remained for the anti-abortion language.

Coming out etiquette guide for those facing confusion

Wait! Please read this article! I have been going to UMass for four years. Although I love this place, I am so tired of being known as my social number or as that nameless face you see in your class all the time. This is my one chance to express who I am as an individual.

I have come out to hundreds of people, both as a member of the Stonewall GLBT Speakers Bureau and in my personal life. I find that most people don't want to be homophobic, but they are not sure how to react to my coming out. I want to make a few suggestions about what to do when someone comes out to you as a GLBT individual. I am making no assumptions about your sexual orientation. If you are GLBT, give this article to your great aunt Thelma in Duluth. If you are straight, you can soak up its profound and subtle witticisms yourself. I also know others will have very different opinions, so don't feel this is some sort of universal word of the Lord. It is just my own thoughts. Here are my suggestions in flagrantly random order:

Chaya Radin

- Do not beat the person into semi-consciousness. This is considered bad etiquette.
- Be honest. I would rather someone say, "I have never met a gay person before" or "Is it true that gay men have an average of 3000 sex partners in their life?" than to lie and say, "I am totally cool with gay people," out of fear of offending me, and then refuse to talk about it again (the answer to the 3000 sex partners question is that most don't have the time, but I know of one guy...).
- Hugging the person is a fine show of your support. All of the GLBT people who I know will not, to my knowledge, assume this to be a come-on, unless you grope him or her and ask if the person wants to have sex with you. Sometimes, even this won't clue them in.
- When meeting a male to female transsexual and you absolutely love her purse, tell her! I personally cannot understand how anyone can go for an hour without losing a thing like that, but that's just me.
- Stereotypes, although often based on reality, are most likely false. I'm not saying this because my TA for my diversity class is giving me extra credit. It's really true. Don't assume a lesbian can fix a car. I, for one, have trouble locating the seat belt sometimes. I know some gay men who love to make flower arrangements, but others who would rather gnaw on them to see if they taste groovy.
- If your roommate comes out, you can still undress in front of him or her. When I am dressing for my 9:05 a.m., class and my roommate is also getting dressed, I am usually thinking things like, "Wow, I have teeth," or perhaps, "All right. I think I understand. The zipper goes in the front of my pants." Complex notions like attraction don't come into play until at least 9:30 a.m. If your roommate is a morning person who is capable of attraction at this ungodly hour, I guess you will simply have to get over yourself. You are not a Greek god. If you are also gay, and you choose to have sex, remember the possibility exists that you might have to later organize some sort of complex plan with advanced nuclear weaponry.
- If you are a straight guy and a woman comes out to you, don't ask to watch. This is suggested for a huge variety of reasons, including many involving treating women with a minimal level of human respect.
- And lastly, when meeting a drag queen: never piss her off! Sticks and stones may break your bones, but a social ruin is permanent.

Well, that's what I want to say. I have one other random suggestion before I go: don't major in something like toenail taxonomy or famous cheeses of the French Revolution unless you are independently wealthy. Take this from a senior who is independently broke and graduating with the gradual understanding that there is a direct reverse correlation between many fascinating fields and employment rates.

I sign, my name with pride, joy and voluptuousness.

Queer Fest to be held on UM campus

What is Queer Fest? Queer Fest is a day-long queer social function that will take place April 30 on the UMass campus. Several events are being planned: A drag show and a semi-formal are in the construction process, as well as a performance from an out musician.

The Pride Alliance, formerly known as the LGBA, is putting together Queer Fest and is still looking for ideas- your ideas! The event is going to be our day in which GLBT individuals can come together, be out, and be visible on campus. Queer Fest is a celebration of our gay pride (of course, gay is an umbrella term referring to all GLBT individuals). We are here, queer, and love to let our fabulous selves shine in the light (or on the Campus Concourse).

If you would like to help out in the planning of Queer Fest, please contact the Pride Alliance Office at 5-0154.

Unisex bathrooms at UMass

When was the last time you entered a room and wondered whether or not security would be called? I have to admit that it has been almost a year since I had to worry about that, but I still remember it vividly. Standing there sweating, trying to figure out whether the need to enter this room and use the facilities outweighed all of the possible problems I could face.

When I bring up this problem, people tend to laugh and think of it as a joke. I admit that I also try to phrase it in an amusing manner, because otherwise, I find it just too depressing. Most folks never have to worry about this special problem. It made me remember the history lesson regarding the signs that were once a regular ornament in the deep South, regulating which facilities were to be used by "whites" versus "colored".

Saul Accetta

By this point, those of you who know your history fairly well, may have figured out what the facilities are that I am speaking of. For those of you who have not, it's very simple. What I am referring to is a distinction, utilized daily, regarding the use of a specific facility. Most people take bathrooms that are labeled male or female for granted and natural. When most people need to use a public bathroom, they don't need to think about whether or not they should go into the men's room or the women's room. Unfortunately there are many who do need to think about this. Many of us are confronted with problems whenever we are faced with the decision about which bathroom to use. Only a year ago, there were many times that my decision regarding which bathroom I should use was left up to others. For instance, I would ask where the bathroom was, even when I already knew, in the hopes that they would specify which bathroom I was expected to utilize: the men's or the women's. Unfortunately many times the bathrooms were right next to each other and I would just receive a vague gesture in that general direction. What I really needed was, "The men's room is over there," or "The ladies' room is around the corner." In fact, one time I was in a coffee shop that had keys for the bathrooms behind the counter. The individual I was speaking to tried to hand me the keys for both bathrooms! He expected me to know which one to take!

The question I expect most folks to be asking at this point is "what is my point?" My point is this: I am not the only individual to face this problem on a daily basis for at least one period of my life. Many women who wear their hair short, or who even just put it under a baseball cap for the day, have been challenged with their right to use the women's bathroom. It is very disconcerting to enter a bathroom, with your mind totally focused on your imminent use of the toilet, only to find yourself confronted by some extremely hostile, disgruntled or just rude person demanding that you defend your right defecate.

There is a taboo in this culture around men utilizing the women's bathroom facilities. Many individuals who are perceived as masculine, regardless of their gender, have security called on them. They are then often asked to produce identification that will support their right to be in that space. Speaking from personal experience, when all you want to do is sit and urinate, having ID demanded by a couple of security guards at the door to your stall is a bit uncomfortable. Many folks I know, who are masculine females, avoid public bathrooms, unless accompanied by a feminine woman friend. These people avoid public bathrooms the same way anyone would avoid shark infested waters.

Female-bodied people are not the only ones who may find it difficult to utilize public bathrooms. Many men who have long hair and/or "effeminate" mannerisms also tend to have problems, though not necessarily involving

Female-bodied people are not the only ones who may find it difficult to utilize public bathrooms. Many men who have long hair and/or "effeminate" mannerisms also tend to have problems, though not necessarily involving

While unisex bathrooms are a problem for many on campus, there are several problems more pressing. Many of the buildings here on campus are in dire need of renovation and rehabilitation. For instance, the Fine Arts Center's roof is in such disrepair that many rooms inside have roofing material is falling down. I would never advocate that a bathroom should take precedence over a roof. But there are alternatives.

A gender neutral bathroom is one where there is a toilet, sink, grab bars for the handicapped, four walls and a door that locks. On the outside of the door there tends to be a sign that either has both the little "man" and "woman" symbols, with a line in between them, or the word "restroom." Whenever an existing building on campus is renovated, or a new one is built, gender neutral bathrooms should be included.

Five College Unity Day held at MHC

On Feb. 21, the Mount Holyoke College Lesbian and Bisexual Alliance hosted the first Five College Unity Day from 2-4:30 p.m. in Blanchard Hall. Rachael Running, a Mount Holyoke student, created the event to strengthen the Five College queer community.

Kelly Lambert, a Mount Holyoke senior, was the emcee for the afternoon. One student from each college gave a speech, and several students performed. Ben Schaffer, from Hampshire College, used his speech to facilitate discussion of the future of the Valley queer community. He addressed the need for increased student activism and collaboration among the five colleges. Lara Neel, an Amherst College student, spoke of the influence of the Five College community on individual student groups. An active Five College community, she suggested, would strengthen the alliances at each college. Several speakers stressed the need for renewed student participation.

Musical entertainment was provided by students as well. The Notables, an a cappella group from Smith College, sang an extended set. Renee and Scotland, singer/guitar players from Mount Holyoke and Hampshire College, played original and cover songs.

After the event, organizers received a positive response from students. Scotland was enthusiastic about the event. Others who attended also felt that because of the success of the event, a similar format will probably be used next year.

Letter from the Editor:

Welcome to the first GLBT Affairs Page. I am Dylan Larke, the new GLBT Affairs Editor. GLBT is simply just an acronym for gay, lesbian, bisexual and trangendered individuals. Please also note that GLBT is an umbrella term that is a reference to all queer folk and their straight allies The GLBT Affairs page will run bi-weekly on Fridays throughout the semester.

My main goal for this page is to incorporate everyone in the queer community. Yes, that means you. I am seeking your input, stories, ideas, editorials, poems, quotes or thoughts or even any random tangents that you would like to see printed in this page. I can even give you your very own column if the idea suits you. I alone cannot represent the GLBT community on campus. Since I am in search of a broad perspective on issues pertaining to the GLBT, I am going to be relying on all of the reds, oranges, yellows, greens, blues, indigos, violets or any other color that deviates from the spectrum.

In case you were wondering, you need not be gay, lesbian, bisexual or trangendered to contribute to the GLBT Affairs page.

This is your chance to be visible and say what you have always wanted to say, but never really got the opportunity to. We care because we have pride in who we are and we are not going to disappear.

You can e-mail me at dlarke@student.umass.edu call me or at the Collegian at 545-1491. You may also stop by the Collegian, located in the basement of the Campus Center. I look forward to hearing from you about the issues that concern you. Sincerely, Dylan Larke

EDITORIAL / OPINION

--- The views and opinions expressed on this page are those of the individual writers and do not necessarily represent the views of the Collegian ---

I'm hooked!

A sad day has dawned in this country.

Actually, I was awake to witness it.

It was 4 a.m., and I had to get up early to type a certain editorial. However, I wasn't sleeping or studying. Over the past two years I have let a terrible addiction slowly take over my life. I know that I'm not alone in my dilemma, in fact, the sheer number of addicts is one of the driving forces of my late night fixation.

Ken Mc Donald

My name is Ken Mc Donald, and I'm an American On Line addict.

It starts as a trickle:

• You sit down at the computer and begin to cruise along the information superhighway. Then you come across the "People Connection Site."

Why not?" you ask, you've got a few minutes to kill. The drug has taken hold.

Soon turning into a downpour:

• Pretty soon you have found other "AOL-heads" that you talk to on a regular basis. You develop connections, and in a weird way, form friendships with people that claim to have the same interests as you. When the computer goes off, you actually miss them. It is now a full blown addiction.

And finally resulting in a flood:

Relationships start to deteriorate around you. Your friends don't recognize you. Your face pales, and blisters form on your fingertips. Weight loss becomes a problem. Studying has lost all meaning, and your parents are now unknowingly spending a fortune to fund your evil habit.

Welcome to the world of web junkies.

I met a girl online once, for fear that she is surfing out the Collegian website right now. I'll call her Candy. So, anyway, Candy and I started talking one day. She was telling me about how she was having boy troubles, (obviously if you are looking for guys online that is problem number one) and I offered to counsel her. In a weird way, I was hoping that she would break up with him. This is the irrational logic that creeps into the mind of a chat-fiend. Candy eventually ended up breaking up with Sergio. We started to call each other; she is halfway across the country, so it is a fairly safe bet that we'll never bump into each other.

She went to Europe for a couple weeks last summer. What is the first thing that she does when she gets to her Swiss hotel? She calls me. Great. Apparently, she had set up a "traveling" shrine to me. If you look at my picture, I don't blame her, but that was a little much. Well, Candy called me two more times, once for 45 minutes. A week later she sent me a stuffed animal she bought in London, and a poster followed not too far behind. What's next, a wedding ring? Keep in mind, we have never met. Needless to say, I was a little creeped out, so I stopped writing back so often. Now we're friends again, if there was ever anything deeper. Sometimes the drug blurs your vision.

There is a school of thought that on-line relationships are noble. You know, because you are falling for another person based solely on their personality. Well, that's great, but I hate to admit it, physical attraction must exist. How do you know that you aren't talking to Lyle Lovett? AOL perverts are very perceptive people, persistent too. Just be smart about what you say and when you say it. My advice is no different than what your parents said about talking to strangers: don't do it. Just because someone is 2,000 miles away, they can still find out where you live.

The web is an interesting place, an introvert's paradise. You can meet others online who say the things you need to hear to feel better, but you never have to see them. Damn, imagine if you could screen all your dates the same way. Isn't that the part of the fun of dating though, trial by error to see what your likes and dislikes are? Call me old fashioned, but dinner and cybersex aren't my idea of a first date.

All I can say is "resist the temptation." When AOL sends you that "free" disk in the mail, realize that it is not really free. Your soul and your identity will be stripped down to nothing more than a screen-name.

This is funkie99, logging off.

Ed/Op is looking for new writers!

The Ed/Op deck is currently seeking new columnists. The way to get involved is by submitting pieces for us to consider publishing. They should be 600-800 words long, well-written and have a point. There are no restrictions on topics, but we are especially interested in pieces on campus politics, satire and work that takes an unexpected perspective.

Editorials can be submitted by emailing letters@pivms.oit.umass.edu or in person to the Collegian offices in the Campus Center basement. Call Tamar Carroll or Dan Bodah at 545-1491 for more information.

The true March Madness

Whoever came up with the term "March Madness" must have been a UMass alumni.

The month isn't half over yet, and it has already been filled with turmoil and insanity. From the embarrassing display of democracy that we call Student Government Association (SGA) elections, to the chaotic state of affairs surrounding UPC and the Spring Concert, college basketball has hardly been the only institution gone temporarily mad this March. I can't say I've felt very proud to be a UMass student over the past few weeks.

The student government elections should be a time when we sit back and appreciate the fact that we live in a democracy where we are encouraged to go out and vote. We should see the democratic system at work, and relish the fact that we are able to have input through our elected student officials. It hasn't been that way around here lately though. The SGA elections were nothing more than a disorganized mix of accusations, disqualifications and over-pamphleting. "She ripped down my poster." "No, he ripped down mine." Anyone who has taken care of business (that's number two for those who are confused) in a John Adams bathroom lately, are most likely aware of the fact that Jeff Howe, Elly Court, Jesse Burchfield and Jen Casasanto all would like an ATM in Southwest. As is clear to anyone who's had the experience of reading propaganda from four or five different campaigns while sitting on the throne, there isn't a problem with the number of posters still remaining (unless, that is, there are too many). The only real problems with this whole election have been that the issues were centered around things like ATM's and ripping down posters. If those are the biggest problems they can handle (we've been waiting for an ATM for 20 years now, by the way), then we have no true hope of ever really improving student life through student government.

Perhaps next year students will demand a serious election with real candidates, as opposed to the group of name calling children we got this year. Somehow, though, I doubt it.

While I'm going on about useless student organizations, let's not forget about UPC. This group of underachievers has now cost the students of this university two Spring Concerts in three years. I think University Productions and Concerts should shorten it's name by removing the defunct "Concert" portion. We'll just "call them UP. Or maybe PU. Well, it doesn't really matter what we call them, because they do nothing for us. This group is allocated a portion of our tuition money, has been offered help from legitimate outside sources and yet still has not put on a show of any real substance. Maybe the time has come when a student organization can no longer bring in the acts suitable for such a show. We may have to lean towards private promoters like MassConcerts and leave UPC behind. If so, I only hope the organization gives us a little warning before the spring of '99.

James Bachman

Finally, I can't end this column without paying tribute to the real boys of Spring March is here, and so is the NCAA tourney. I've got one word four our team, as well as the other 64 that made this years cut: hunger. At the college level, most teams have skill, but the team that wants it the most usually wins. When I go home for break, I will undoubtedly trounce my 14-year-old brother in a few games of 1-on-1. I will beat him without mercy, making fun of his lack of game the whole time. But you know what? He'll pick his scrubby self up and come back for more. Why? Because there is nothing he wants more that winning. If I'm beating him 10-0 in a game to 11, he'll still be looking for that steal so he can try and get a run together. He wants to stop his big brother so bad that he can taste it. That's hunger. That's what UMass, and every other tournament team in the country needs this time of year. We had a little bit in '96. And Arizona was certainly hungry for that title last year. By the time we come back from break, there will only be four teams left in the hunt for a national title, and they'll all be drooling over the possibilities. Who's it gonna be? Only the hungry will survive.

James Bachman is a UMass student.

Would you like to write for Ed-OP?
Then come down to the Campus Center Basement and speak to either Tamar Carroll or Daniel Bodah.

Educated women and population

To the editor:

On International Women's Day, the day in which we celebrate women worldwide, it is important to remember how privileged we are here in the United States. Family planning and reproductive services are not accessible to many women throughout the world. These women do not have the option of making choices that we simply take for granted. It is estimated that more than 120 million women worldwide would like to control their pregnancies or space births of their children farther apart; yet do not have access to convenient and affordable family planning.

Due to lack of accessible family planning, there will be an increase of approximately 1.2 billion people in developing countries over the next 50 years, one-third of the projected population growth. Most often contraceptives are either inaccessible, too expensive or the types available are extremely limited. In some regions of Sub-Saharan Africa, the nearest contraceptive provider is over two hours away.

It is proven that the more educated a woman is about her body and the more freedom she has to make decisions concerning it, the healthier she will be. Family planning and reproductive health services decrease the number of high-risk pregnancies, sexually transmitted diseases and unhealthy childbirths, thus improving the health of both women and children. It is important to remember that social and cultural differences do exist. In many societies women are abused or looked down upon if they use birth control. If a woman in one of these societies should desire to control her family size, shouldn't sexual education or another method of contraception be accessible?

The growth of available family planning services has led to an increase in the use of contraception from 10 percent in 1965 to 50 percent today. In 1995, the United States provided $547 million for international family planning assistance. This year the assistance has dropped to $385 million. The United States, which has always been a leader in providing international family planning, has begun to forget how inherently important it is for women to make decisions about themselves and their family size. Without access to family planning options, the decisions women choose to make are simply fruitless.

Inaccuracies about equine conference

To the editor:

I would like to address Jason Trenkle's article in Collegian (March 9) covering last weekend's Equine Conference. The author chose to discuss the scientific aspects of the seminar, but should have taken a basic biology course before venturing to write on the subject. He begins with an incorrect cause and effect: the stallion becomes aroused when he senses a mare in heat. A mare cannot "become in heat" from the momentary behavior of another animal. The author then gives absolutely asinine reasons why the mare may not show signs of heat. Another backward cause and effect follows: heat is a product of the "ovulation period," not the cause. As anybody knows from high-school biology, the sperm travels to the egg and fertilization occurs in the oviduct (Fallopian tubes). Trenkle leads us to believe that the egg must spend three days "completing the ovulation cycle" before sperm can be introduced. Although it's true that naturally, horses breed with longer daylight hours, I'd like to know what an ovula is?!! I can only conclude that Trenkle meant ovaries. My first reaction to the word ovula (which simply doesn't exist) was the little "thingy" that hangs in the back of our throats (called the uvula).

Next, Trenkle claims that breeders prefer to breed in the winter "so that the horses can develop into a strong breed at a young age." Again, I must make an assumption, maybe he wanted to say, so that the young animals will develop strength throughout the summer and be ready for the harsher winter? Stating that horses will develop into a strong breed is on par with stating that your Beagle will develop into a Rottweiler if born at the right time of year.

To his credit, Trenkle managed not to make a horrendous mess of quoting the presenters, Douglas Freeman and Koyla Renaas. However, he failed to mention that the conference began Saturday with a lecture series at the Mullins Center, I'm sure this article could have been handled without delving into science, with issues such as Saturday's lecture topics, attendance of the event, opinions of participants, etc. If the Collegian felt the story needed a science perspective, it should have been assigned to someone with a basic understanding of biology, rather than allowing Jason Trenkle to make a fool of himself in print. Finally, the phone number given was incorrect. For information on the Department of Veterinary and Animal Sciences, contact 545- 2312.

The "Great American Meatout"

To the editor:

On March 20, the first day of spring, The Farm Animal Reform Movement (FARM) will be sponsoring its 14th annual "Great American Meatout." Patterned on the American Cancer Society's annual "Great American Smokeout," there will be educational events throughout the United States that will attempt to educate people about the benefits of vegetarian diets. FARM hopes that many Americans will kick the meat habit at least on the day of the meatout, and to explore a less violent diet. This is a very good time to consider the many reasons for switching to a vegetarian diet.

1. Concerned about health? Animal-based diets have been linked to degenerative diseases, such as heart problems, strokes and various types of cancer.

2. Concerned about animals? Over 9 billion animals are killed for their flesh annually in the United States after lives of abject suffering in confined spaces where they are denied fresh air, exercise or any satisfaction of natural instincts.

3. Concerned about the environment? The production of animal products is a major contributor to soil depletion and erosion, extensive pesticides, air and water pollution, the rapid destruction of tropical rain forests and other ecosystems, and global warming.

4. Concerned about world hunger? Over 70 percent of the grain grown in the United States is fed to animals destined for slaughter, while 20 million people die annually of hunger and its effects. The U.S. is also one of the world's largest importers of beef and fish, and these imports are generally from countries where people are starving.

5. Concerned about resource scarcities? A meat-based diet requires up to 20 times more land and 14 times more water and energy than a vegetarian diet. Non-vegetarian diets also require vast amounts of pesticide use, chemical fertilizer and other resources.

6. Concerned about spiritual values? Vegetarian diets are most consistant with religious mandates to act with compassion toward animals, preserve human health, help hungry people, protect the environment, conserve resources and pursue peace.

So, for our health, for defenseless animals, for millions of starving people, for our earth and its resources, and for a more peaceful, just, and harmonious world, let's go vegetarian! And a great time to start is March 20, during the "Great American Meatout."

Suspicious menu on "Seinfeld"

By Lynn Elber
Associated Press

LOS ANGELES — You might want to think twice before ordering at the "Seinfeld" diner. It appears it may have tasteless fare. The menu board at Monk's, the make-believe hangout for Jerry and the gang, tends toward unappetizing and even profane items in a photograph printed in the April issue of Swing magazine.

Besides a grilled burger "on Lice," the menu includes a "Double Chili B— Burger" and "2 Large Fresh Humor." It's enough to drive a hungry customer into the arms of the Soup Nazi.

The picture was shot on the "Seinfeld" set in early December as part of a profile of producers Jeff Schaffer and Alec Berg. Swing spokeswoman Tory Johnson said Tuesday.

It was unclear if the menu board, tucked into a corner of the set, has ever made it into an episode of the show with off-color listings intact.

According to Swing's photo caption, Schaffer and Berg devised the menu.

A call for comment from the pair and from series producer Castle Rock Entertainment was not immediately returned Tuesday. NBC declined comment.

Whether intended as an in-house gag or not, the display's reference to homosexuals tasted sour to some.

"It sounds fairly anti-gay to me and certainly not in keeping with the show's progressive outlook on life," said David Smith, spokesman for the Human Rights Campaign, the nation's largest gay and lesbian political organization.

"At the same time, in the context of that entire menu, it sounds ridiculously juvenile," he said.

"Seinfeld," the No. 1 comedy on television, is wrapping up its nine-season run this May.

"I doubt very seriously there will be protests outside of the Seinfeld' set for anti-gay bias," Smith said. "However, it's clearly offensive and juvenile and should be taken down." Swing, a 100,000-circulation, New York-based magazine, is aimed at readers in their 20s. The April issue will be on newsstands within a week.

Franken debuts new sitcom on NBC

By Lynn Elber
Associated Press

LOS ANGELES — Al Franken, who gave us the book Rush Limbaugh is a Big, Fat Idiot and Other Observations, insists that "Lateline," his new NBC sitcom, isn't political.

Yes, the series loosely based on ABC's "Nightline" is set in Washington.

Yes, a number of political figures including Congressmen Richard Gephardt and Barney Frank and Watergate burglar G. Gordon Liddy make appearances.

But Franken says he wants "Lateline" to be a classic, character-based sitcom, not a political science lesson — and definitely not a left-wing tract.

"I hate liberal TV shows. I hate when shows say they're liberal," he said. "They usually don't do it well. Also, when comedy shows proselytize, they're usually not funny.

"If anybody takes it on the chin in this show it's probably the media. But I don't think it's appropriate for this show to be about my political values," Franken said.

The comedy, which debuts 9:30 p.m. EST Tuesday on NBC, stars Franken as the earnest and painfully untelegenic Al Freundlich. He's a "Lateline" correspondent who longs to be king — read "anchorman" — while carrying the flame of journalistic integrity. That glamour spot, however, is filled by Pearce McKenzie (Robert Foxworth), who has the requisite combination of polished air, voice and arrogance. He's not a Ted Koppel parody, says John Markus, who, along with Franken, created and produces "Lateline."

"Our anchor is an amalgam of many anchors. He's venal. He's elegant in the way that James Bond is elegant," said Markus. Also part of the newsroom landscape are Miguel Ferrer as the savvy producer in charge of "Lateline," and Megyn Price as the patient producer in charge of Freundlich.

To steep themselves in the atmosphere of a nightly news show, Franken and staff spent time in the offices of "Nightline."

"We wanted to be grounded in some reality, to do a workplace comedy where we understood what their actual work was. What we saw there was how exciting it is to get a show on every night," Franken said.

As with "Nightline," the sitcom's news staff scrambles to put together programs on issues or breaking stories. But don't look for highly topical references in "Lateline;" the six episodes NBC has ordered were taped months ago.

The sitcom makes lighthearted use of its serious guests. In one episode, Gephardt and former Labor Secretary Robert Reich are set to appear as part of a strike story but end up as Buddy Hackett pundits for a misguided profile of the comedian.

A Gephardt-Reich duet on "Shipoopi," Hackett's number from the 1962 movie The Music Man, ensues.

"We want to show people being themselves and write things appropriate for them. Their politics don't come into play," Markus said.

The ultimate goal is to appeal both to viewers plugged into politics and those who couldn't pick Bill Clinton or Newt Gingrich out of a police lineup.

It's like his Limbaugh book, Franken says: "You really didn't have to know much about politics to read the book and enjoy it. But if you did, you enjoyed it maybe a little bit more."

"Lateline" is a change of pace for the nasal-voiced comedian with the puckish grin. He earned his own five-TV stripes as a longtime writer-player for "Saturday Night Live" and regularly dabbles in political satire, including election commentary for Comedy Central.

Florida Atlantic has been playing since the January 26, and has compiled a 22–5 record, including a few wins over nationally ranked teams. They are also coached by former pitching great Joan Joyce whose star players have been Liz Nadna, compiling a 1.60 ERA, and Lisa Schaus, who is currently batting an impressive .347.

On Saturday, UMass will face Bradley at 11 a.m. and Central Michigan at 3 p.m. The Bradley Braves are currently 2–5. Their lead pitcher, Aimee Nielsen, has a 1.40 ERA. They have several solid sluggers, including rookie surprise Amy Fouts. Fouts is batting .571, and has a slugging percentage of .647.

Despite Central Michigan's slow start (2–5) they also feature a solid pitching staff, as well as quality hitters. After the Central Michigan game, the tournament playoffs will start, and will continue through Sunday.

"We might get a couple of breaks," Sortino said, "But this is our last trip out of our region, and we're going to be in waters that are going to test us."

All of UMass' games thus far this season have taken place in tournaments. This invitational will be their last one before they resume regular season play. The Minutewomen are currently 2–8 overall. They have had a week off since their last tournament, The National Fast-Pitch Coaches Association Leadoff Classic. They went 1–5 in that tournament, taking on some of the nation's best teams.

UMass started off the season in Arizona for the Coca–Cola Classic. Despite several glimpses of excellence, the team left the tournament with a losing record as well, going 1–3. They faced off against top national competition by taking on such teams as No. 3 Washington and No. 14 Long Beach State.

UMass had started the season ranked No. 12 in the nation by the USA Today/NFCA Coaches poll. After their showing in Arizona, however, they fell out of the rankings. The team had hoped to climb back into the top 25 with a good showing in Georgia, but things just didn't go their way.

"It was a multiplicity of things going awry. Our pitching was marginal, and we're a better pitching staff than what we have pitched. Our hitting was absent."

The Minutewomen did get a strong showing from their sluggers. Junior Mandy Galas and senior Tracey Osier tied for a team–high six hits. Of those 12, all singles, only two left the infield. Seventeen of UMass' 50 singles in the tournament came on fast baserunners beating infield slaps and bunts.

Junior Becky George was one of the few highlights for UMass, sporting a .304 average, and a .360 on base percentage. Freshman pitcher Carrie Jeffries also continued in her progress. She is the No. 2 starter and leads the team with a 2.30 ERA. Junior pitcher Danielle Henderson is poised to break yet another school record. With 488 strikeouts, she only needs five more to break Kelly Daut's record of 491 and already holds 14 other school records.

Working on the Minutewomen's side will be the week of rest and practice time that they were able to get in after the NFCA Leadoff Classic.

"We needed it after the last tournament. I think that we were a very droopy team. Our confidence was shaken. We came back from Atlanta with a lot of question marks. We've had six practices since then, and all of them have been highly productive."

After the invitational, UMass will play Bradley on March 16, followed by a game with Florida A&M on March 17.

the nation's previous No. 1, Princeton, a 9-7 loss at home.

The Minutemen, however, are where they wanted to be heading into the contest.

"When we looked at the schedule we said we wanted to be 3-0 heading into the Virginia game, and that's where we are," Cannella said. "You hope that through the first three games the guys gained the confidence they need to face a team like Virginia."

UMass has every reason to have that confidence. Sophomore attackman Mike Janowicz has recorded five goals in each of the three tilts, while senior midfielder Mike DelPercio has eight goals in the young season. To balance what the offense has been able to do, the UMass defense has responded as well. The defensive unit has only allowed 14 goals on the year compared to the Minutemen's 49 goals scored. Senior goaltender John Kassekalis has allowed seven successful strikes, while making 18 saves. Even with all they have accomplished, Cannella said it will take a complete effort to hold down the Cavaliers.

"This started in the locker room right after the [Hartford] game," Cannella said. "We will have to give a major league effort because they are a very good team."

In order to do that, the Minutemen will have to execute on every offensive opportunity and keep penalty minutes to a minimum.

"Looking at the scouting report, we're going to have to defend well and finish opportunities on offense," Cannella said. "We also have to limit our errors."

Staying out of the penalty box was a focus of Cannella's game preparation following UMass' game against Fairfield on March 7. In a 13-4 win over the Stags, UMass racked up over 4:00 of penalties.

"We have to cut back on our man-down situations or Virginia will kill us," senior captain P.G. Massey said after the Fairfield matchup.

The Minutemen have their work cut out for them. Dom Starsia brings in a talented corps anchored by junior captain Tucker Radebaugh and sophomore Drew McKnight. Radebaugh had made a move from midfield to the attack and McKnight flourished last season with the Cavaliers' talented, but now graduated, attack pair of Doug Knight and Michael Watson.

On defense, sophomore Ryan Curtis has drawn the job of guarding the opposition's top attackman. He has already squared off against last year's Player of the Year, Casey Powell of Syracuse, and Princeton's Jon Hess. Senior Chris Sanderson will secure the defense with his play in front of the Virginia net.

CBS changes the way it televises March Madness

By Josh Dubow
Associated Press

NEW YORK — CBS, welcome home.

Fresh off a disastrous Olympics plagued by weather delays and programming blunders, CBS has returned to a more familiar path, the "Road to the Final Four."

Fueled by big upsets and last-second wins, CBS' first day of tournament coverage was something that the day-late Nagano games were not — spontaneous.

To help viewers get through the opening weekend, executive producer Terry Ewert, in his first tournament at CBS, added a few new wrinkles to the broadcast. The continuous time and score box is in, keeping viewers up to date on the games. The quad screen look at four games at a time was mostly out, eliminating a frustrating device that left viewers unable to watch any game.

Also when CBS took viewers to a live look-in of the other games, it kept the time and score of the main game posted on the top of the screen, so viewers won't be left wondering what is happening in their main game.

The highlight of the opening day was the back-to-back, last-second wins by Richmond and Cincinnati. After BJ McKie's shot at the buzzer missed, sending No. 3 seed South Carolina to its second consecutive first-round upset, CBS juxtaposed Richmond's celebration with McKie collapsed in the lane.

After a quick jump to the studio in the New York, the entire country saw the final seconds of Cincinnati's three-point win against Northern Arizona. Unfortunately only about a quarter of the country saw both finishes live. The rest of the country, watching the Cincinnati game, was at a commercial during Richmond's upset and did not see highlights of the finish until after their game ended.

Women's gym looks to fell top Michigan squad

By Brett Mauser
Collegian Staff

Heading back to his old stomping grounds, one could bet that Massachusetts women's gymnastics coach Dave Kuzara will have his team more prepared than ever.

Kuzara, assistant coach May May Leung, and team choreographer Megan Shields all graduated from the University of Michigan, with Kuzara making a brief assistant coaching stint. They once had Wolverine blood in them, but since have flushed the streams in favor of the maroon and white.

Tomorrow, the Minutewomen will venture into hostile territory when they battle the No. 4 Michigan Wolverines with revenge in mind. It will be the Gym Alumni Meet for the Wolverines.

"There will be a strong representation of the maroon and white there with May, Megan and myself all having graduated from there," Kuzara said.

Last year, the Wolverines came to the Mullins Center and walked away with a 195.000–193.700 victory in front of a record crowd of 2,435. After the loss, the Minutewomen bounced back with a school record 194.915 against Rhode Island and Bridgeport.

This year, nine of the 11 letter-winners return to the squad in pursuit of a national championship, including the well- rounded Sarah Cain and Nikki Peters.

"The rotation favors them," said Kuzara. "We have to end on beam and that has probably been our weakest event all year, but the girls understand the importance of this meet."

The schedule does not get any easier for the Minutewomen. The Atlantic 10 Championships come calling next weekend, and the Minutewomen are looking to pick up their tenth win of the season. Double digits in the victory column have eluded the Minutewomen only once in the last nine seasons (nine victories in 1995–96).

Minutewomen Notes: The Minutewomen are coming off a solid performance in their first–ever meeting with the Northeastern Huskies. All healthy bodies on the squad contributed to the 189.800–175.750 win... Freshman Jill Fisher has posted a 9.9 or better on the floor exercise in the last five meets. She is a front-runner for the 1998 Atlantic 10 Rookie of the Year ... Saginaw, MI native Sara Kelly returns home this weekend for the clash with Michigan... The Minutewomen are 3-0 in dual meets on the season. Head–to–head competitions include victories over Rhode Island, then–No. 22 New Hampshire and Northeastern on Senior Day last weekend... the team currently ranks third in the northeast region behind Penn State and Ohio State.

No. 2 Kentucky able to mix up players for win

By Paul Newberry
Associated Press

ATLANTA — The "T" in Tubbyball must stand for team. Kentucky believes common goals are more important than individual achievement, the sort of philosophy that might sound downright socialist in these free-enterprise, me-first times. Oh sure, the Wildcats (29-4) have plenty of talent — six different guys have scored at least 20 points in a game — but they never seem to rely on the same player for very long.

Kentucky's leading scorer averages only 13.2 points per game, and just two other players are scoring in double figures — hardly the kind of numbers one would expect from a team seeded second in the NCAA South Regional that might just be playing as well as anyone in the country.

"We've got confidence that seven or eight guys can step up and be the marquee player," Cameron Mills said. "That presents problems for the other team. They never know what guy's going to step up and give us a lift."

It might be Mills, who scored 31 points against Florida. It could be Nazr Mohammed or Scott Padgett. Then again, maybe the Wildcats will turn to Wayne Turner, the MVP of the Southeastern Conference tournament. Or Heshimu Evans. And we haven't even gotten to leading scorer Jeff Sheppard.

First-year coach Tubby Smith instilled the team concept from the day he replaced Rick Pitino and realized that Ron Mercer and Derek Anderson were in the NBA.

"He told us, 'Don't be selfish, go out and play as a team and we'll get the victories.' It's worked well so far," swingman Allen Edwards said.

The Wildcats' commitment to the team concept was never more evident than in last week's SEC tournament at the Georgia Dome, where they'll face South Carolina State (22-7) in the first round today.

Edwards missed the conference semifinals because he was attending his mother's funeral, but Kentucky still defeated Arkansas by 25 points. Early in the second half, though, Sheppard went down with a sprained ankle, meaning he wouldn't be able to play in the championship against South Carolina.

Did that affect the Wildcats? Hardly. Edwards returned from the funeral, took Sheppard's spot in the lineup and helped lead a 30-point rout of the Gamecocks.

"I like the way we're playing," said Smith, hardly bothered that Kentucky doesn't have a clear-cut superstar.

"The attitude of team-first has permeated our program."

The other first-round contests in Atlanta have seventh-seeded Massachusetts (21-10) against No. 10 Saint Louis (21-10); No. 3 Michigan (24-8) vs. No. 14 Davidson (20-9); and No. 6 UCLA (22-8) taking on No. 11 Miami (18-9).

Sheppard's ankle makes him questionable for today's game, while Mohammed is nursing a bruised shoulder. After last weekend, though, the Wildcats hardly seem vulnerable against a team like South Carolina State, champion of the Mid-Eastern Athletic Conference. Only three No. 15 seeds have won their first-round game. But South Carolina State coach Cy Alexander doesn't think his team will be intimidated by the mighty Wildcats, who won the national championship in 1996 and were runner-up to Arizona last season.

"We would not be here if we weren't champions," Alexander said. "I've told our guys that we're playing five guys in a Kentucky uniform. We're not playing the aura of Kentucky basketball."

The Bulldogs played a difficult non-conference schedule, losing respectably at North Carolina State (68-67) and South Carolina (90-85). They have a top backcourt combination in Roderick Blakney (20.6 points per game) and Tyler Brown (15.8).

"I think our perimeter game can compete with Kentucky's kids," Alexander said. "Where we're at a distinct disadvantage is in the frontcourt. Those guys will have to play an above-normal game to compete with Kentucky's size."

Size is not a problem for UMass, which has 6-foot-10 Lari Ketner at center and 247-pounder Tyrone Weeks at forward. Also, the Minutemen have adapted to second-year coach Bruiser Flint, whose initial season was stained by the controversy of former player Marcus Camby accepting gifts from agents.

"Last year was difficult because of the transition from [former coach John Calipari] and the whole Camby situation," Flint said. "This year has been a whole lot smoother."

The bulky Minutemen are a team that seems custom-built for the zone defense, but don't expect Saint Louis to spend much time in that alignment.

UM kicks off NCAA's against St. Louis

PAUL BRUDNICKI / COLLEGIAN

Charlton Clarke and the No. 7 seed men's basketball team will try to figure out the St. Louis zone as they meet the No. 10 seeded Billikens today at 2:45 p.m.

By Corey Peter Goodman & Luke Meredith
Collegian Staff

ATLANTA — Less than 24 hours from its NCAA opening round matchup against St. Louis (21–10), the Massachusetts men's basketball team appeared to be mentally, and most importantly, physically ready for the challenge that awaits them.

UMass (21–10) looked extremely active and refreshed during yesterday's 40 minute shoot around. They will face off against the Billikens today at approximately 2:45 p.m. at the Georgia Dome in Atlanta.

"We've worked real hard in practice, and we believe we are ready to play," Massachusetts forward Mike Babul said.

Weeks ready to go: Senior forward Tyrone Weeks said he will play today, despite a nagging ankle injury that limited him during last week's A-10 tournament. Weeks sat out most of yesterday's light shoot around at the Georgia Dome, resting the ankle he twisted last Monday in practice.

"I'll be ready to go," Weeks said. "It's still sore, but I'm going to have to play with some pain. There are things I work on in practice that I can't do. It becomes a mental battle for me."

Bring on the zone: It's no secret that the Billikens hope to confuse and UMass today with its matchup zone defense, however, St. Louis coach Charlie Spoonhour was candid about his own team's confusion when applying the defense.

Turning the TV tide: "Our zone is still awful," he said. "The only time our zone is effective is when the other team argues whose turn it is to score."

The Billikens have been fielding questions concerning their lack of success on television this season. During its last televised game, St. Louis was on the wrong end of an embarrassing 30 point blowout against Cincinnati. Larry Hughes, though, downplayed the effect television has on his team.

"It won't make a difference tomorrow," he said. "Everyone is going to play stronger no matter what television channel the game is on."

Against Cincinnati: Hughes compared the UMass bruising style of play to that of Conference USA rival Cincinnati. The Billikens, who face an overwhelming size and strength disadvantage against the Minutemen, know their fate may depend on how well they perform on the glass.

"We've got to make it a war inside," junior forward Ryan Luechtefeld said. "I'm very concerned with how well they rebound the ball."

> "We've worked real hard in practice, and we believe we are ready to play."
> Massachusetts forward Mike Babul said.

Watch your step: Junior guard Charlton Clarke drew a few laughs in yesterday's NCAA press conference when he reached for the back railing behind the NCAA banner. Clarke's jesting was in reference to the last time UMass played in the Georgia Dome, which was during the 1996 Sweet Sixteen. Carmelo Travieso fell off the press conference stage, a highlight that was replayed over and over on TV.

"I just wanted to make sure I know where the railings are," Clarke joked. "I want to be known on ESPN for good things, not comical things." Travieso wasn't hurt in the incident, and UMass went on to beat Arkansas and Georgetown to advance to the Final Four.

Mano-a-mano: The assignment of defending St. Louis star freshman Larry Hughes has fallen in the lap of sophomore forward Mike Babul. Babul is no stranger to this roll though, having defended players such as Kansas All- American forward Paul Pierce and George Washington forward Yegor Mescheriakov.

"It seems all anyone talks about on St. Louis is Hughes," Babul said. "[But] I've guarded a lot of good players this year."

Hughes led the Billikens in scoring at 21.7 points per game.

"I enjoy watching Hughes play," Spoonhour said. "He brings a little life to practice ... he does things in a workman-like fashion."

Women's lacrosse renews rivalry in opener versus the Crimson

By Seth Koenig
Collegian Staff

In 1982, when the Harvard women's lacrosse team took the field against the University of Massachusetts, they were trying to hand the then undefeated Minutewomen their first loss of the season as the UMass squad steamrolled toward their first and only national championship. The Crimson's hope for victory took the form of Francesca McClellan, their standout player who, with 60 goals that year, was on her way to winning her second consecutive Ivy League Player of the Year award. In that same year, McClellan led the World Cup gold medal winning United States women's lacrosse team in scoring, but she could not lead her school to victory against the Minutewomen.

Fast forward to 1997. With ten seconds left, down by a point to the Harvard Crimson, the Massachusetts women's lacrosse team fires two placed shots at the opposing goal, only to have neither hit the back of the net. The game ends in a 6–5 loss for UMass, their closest defeat in a 6–7 season, potentially leaving them a goal away from a winning overall record. Again, McClellan, now the coach of the team she was gunning for 15 years earlier, was on the losing end of a big game between the two schools.

One year later, Harvard travels to Garber Field for the latest matchup in the long, storied history of the Crimson versus Minutewomen competition.

"It was a big rivalry. A very big rivalry," McClellan said. "When I played, Harvard was just coming on the national scene. The game of the year was always UMass. If we saw them during the regular season, typically we'd see them during the postseason. When UMass played Harvard it was usually for a slot in the playoffs or a first round game, so it was a real grudge match."

Now, things have changed, as Massachusetts is only in its sixth year after a two-year disparision that ended in 1992. Names and faces have changed as well, as Liz Berkery- Drury takes the reigns of the Harvard team for her first game as the head coach, with few of today's players able to remember the legendary matchups of yesteryear.

"UMass by the mid '80s had started to not be as strong a program, and Harvard had kept building on that winning; all the way to a national championship in '89," McClellan said. "UMass was it, and Harvard had to beat them. Then Harvard was it, and UMass had to beat them."

This time around, the two teams are on a fairly even plane going into the game. The Minutewomen will be lead by tri- captains Amy Leder, Jen Bowen and Melissa Anderson, and leading scorer Laura Koruz. Defending the cage will be one of two outstanding young freshmen, Tara Durkin and Jen Nardi.

"We have two strong, talented and experienced goalies." McClellan said. "They're very level-headed and mature for freshman. The test will be how they hold up over the course of an entire game. How will they deal when so many shots that will come at them, and things like that."

Harvard isn't the only challenge awaiting Massachusetts this spring break. Holy Cross and New Hampshire are both scheduled for the upcoming week, as well. However, when combined, their first three opponents' 1997 records add up to 11–30; a scary number when one realizes that the next three opponents. Yale, Temple, and Brown, make up an intimidating 36-12 mark. The Minutewomen can't afford to get comfortable with sub-par teams early in the season with such powerhouses on the horizon.

"I think our kids are pretty familiar with the teams that we're up against," McClellan said. "I'm not too thrilled about having Yale, Temple and Brown in a row. Those are our three hardest games of the season, right there. What I am happy about is that we have a warmup of sorts."

Still, Coach McClellan and the girls are not looking past Harvard.

"I think Harvard is a great beginning game for us," McClellan said. "For these kids who have not yet beat Harvard, this is a really realistic challenge and I think that will really help them going into the games against the big three.

"We're taking it one game at a time. No team's a pushover in this sport."

Softball to compete in Florida invitational after already facing off against top teams

By Jackie Leroux
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts softball team will be spending their spring break in Florida this year. They will be in Tallahassee to compete in the Lady Seminole Invitational tournament which starts today and runs through March 15.

Unlike UMass' previous two tournaments, this one will not feature any ranked opponents. The Minutewomen, however, will still have their hands full.

"We'll have an opportunity to finally play some non–ranked teams, which will be a bit of a break for us," coach Elaine Sortino said. "But a lot of these teams are the kind of teams that can sneak up on you. In our pool Northern Illinois, Florida Atlantic and Central Michigan will be very formidable."

The Minutewomen will start off by playing Furman at 1 p.m. today. The Minutewomen are 3–0 all time against Furman with their last meeting coming in 1997, also in the Invitational. At 3 p.m. today UMass will face off against Northern Illinois, followed by a 9 p.m. game with Florida Atlantic University.

Men's lacrosse takes on No. 3 Virginia at home

By Casey Kane
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts men's lacrosse team is staring down the barrel at the meaty part of its schedule. And for the Minutemen, opponents don't get much meatier than Virginia.

After three early-season wins in which the Minuteman margin of victory averaged nearly 12 goals, UMass will face its stiffest test thus far when the No. 3 Cavaliers come into tomorrow's matchup at Richard F. Garber Field (12 p.m.). "They are nothing like what we have faced so far," UMass coach Greg Cannella said.

Virginia's record stands at 3-1, but what is impressive is the schedule the Cavaliers have faced in compiling that mark. Their only loss came at the hands of top ranked Syracuse. In a one-goal game that went into overtime. Last weekend, Virginia handed

Crude oil prices fall, depression a possibility

CARACAS, Venezuela (AP) — Plummeting crude prices have begun to wreak havoc in the economies of the world's oil-producing nations. Governments are slashing budgets and growth forecasts, companies are scrapping investment and citizens from Quito to Tehran are preparing for hard times.

"Our economy is built on oil, so we are bracing for a real depression," said an Iranian businessman, Omid Rostamani. Last week, futures prices for North Sea Brent blend dropped to $11.90 a barrel, the lowest in a decade. Prices for other petroleum types also have slumped, and oil-dependent countries stand to lose billions of dollars if prices don't recover soon.

The result may be less money for badly needed social programs in places including Mexico City and Jakarta, Indonesia.

Lackluster demand blamed on Asia's financial crisis and an unusually warm winter produced the million-barrel-a-day glut on world markets that sent prices tumbling. Oil ministers of Saudi Arabia, Venezuela and Mexico announced Sunday that they have agreed to work together to reduce output by at least 1.6 million barrels a day.

NATION

Tornadoes storm through N. Carolina

MAYODAN, N.C. — The storms that lashed parts of North Carolina and Georgia with killer tornadoes left some congregations without churches for Sunday services.

"The Lord giveth, and the Lord taketh away," said the Rev. Paul Sisk, whose West Side Baptist Church was destroyed by last Friday's twister. "I don't know why, but I don't even question why." The twister destroyed Sisk's church and the Mayodan United Methodist Church. Members of both congregations pledged to rebuild and come back even stronger.

"In the midst of this, there's not just the death of the building, but there's the resurrection of our congregation," said the Rev. Doug Miller of United Methodist.

Residents said two smaller tornadoes swept across Mayodan and apparently converged over the Mayo River, producing one tornado that gathered strength as it swept toward Stoneville, less than 5 miles away.

"It turned the sky greenish-brown. It was the most peculiar thing I've ever seen," said Sims Cromwell, owner of a business between the two towns.

Last Friday's tornado killed two people in Stoneville, leaving much of the business district in ruins and closed to visitors because of potential structural problems. Duke Power said about 1,500 customers in the area remained without power Sunday.

The Board of Higher Education decided not to vote on the Course And Teacher Evaluation (CATE) guide last Tuesday, but it will be debated through collective bargaining.

The Board of Higher Education decided not to vote on the resolution concerning the CATE guide at the meeting.

Eleanor Court, student representative to the Board of Higher Education, said an official vote from the Board does not directly affect acceptance or rejection of the CATE guide, but a vote of support would have helped.

"A formal vote on the resolution would have helped support it but really has no effect on the collective bargaining process," Court said.

However, Court felt there wasn't a loss because the Board did not vote on the resolution.

"We didn't lose any ground by not taking an official vote," Court said.

The implementation of the CATE guide, which would provide students with information about courses and teachers before enrolling, will be decided through collective bargaining.

Collective bargaining is the contract negotiation process that is a collaborative effort between student representatives, union and faculty members.

If the CATE guide does not survive collective bargaining Court feels there are other avenues to get the guide into publication.

"If it doesn't work through this process we'll just do it through another one," Court said.

According to Court if the CATE guide is approved it may take a year before it is implemented because the collective bargaining process takes an unknown amount of time.

"Collective bargaining can take a year to negotiate a coniract so it's hard to say when it would take effect but it could be next fall," Court said in an earlier interview.

University President, William Bulger will also need to approve the CATE guide in order for it to come into being.

James Carlin, Chairman of the Board of Higher Education, could not be reached for comment.

John Paul II visits African countries

By Victor L. Simpson
Associated Press

ONITSHA, Nigeria— Braving sweltering heat, Pope John Paul II issued a powerful call yesterday for change in this country in the grip of military rule, telling Nigerians to rid their society of "everything that offends human dignity or violates human rights." Hundreds of thousands turned out for the papal Mass in the country's Roman Catholic heartland, a rare day of celebration for a hard-pressed people.

Pope John Paul II

The pope preached from an altar beneath a thatched hut that faced a red dustbowl and beatified a priest, Cyprian Michael Iwene Tansi.

Since John Paul arrived Saturday for a three-day visit, his message to the military regime that seized power in 1993 coup has been strikingly direct. The pope kept up the pressure in yesterday's Mass.

"All Nigerians must work to rid society of everything that offends the dignity of the human person or violates human rights," he said. "This means reconciling differences, overcoming ethnic rivalries and injecting honesty, efficiency and competence in the art of governing."

Starting before dawn, hundreds of thousands of people — on foot, perched on motorbikes and crammed into buses — converged on the Mass site, an airfield on the outskirts of Onitsha.

The road to the airport was lined with huge portraits of Tansi and the pope, and blocked by a miles-long traffic jam. In one battered old Mercedes, a group of nuns stopped to say some prayers and set out on foot for the final leg of the journey.

One after another, people praised the pope and urged him to help free their country from the shackles of a military junta that jails its opponents, kills at will and stifles opposition.

"My prayers are that he will bring us peace," said 23-year-old Ugwuanyi Evenin who walked at least 10 miles with her father to see the pope. "This is twice he comes to Nigeria, that means he likes the Nigerian people."

Noting the military junta's promise to hold elections later this year, John Paul said "there was no place" for abuse of power, misuse of authority, or arbitrarily excluding individuals or groups from politics.

The promise of free elections has been met by wide skepticism. The last national elections, in 1993, were voided by the military government and the apparent winner, Moshood Abiola, was jailed and remains in custody.

John Paul flew here from Abuja, the capital, his helicopter setting off a swirl of red dust over well-wishers. The 77-year-old pope, beset by ailments in recent years, walked slowly in the West African heat — around 100 degrees — and 95-percent humidity. He looked tired, but smiled and waved to the crowd.

Rolling Stone to sponsor milk mustache competition

By Jason Trenkle
Collegian Staff

Rock stars Eddie and Alex Van Halen won't be the only ones sporting milk mustaches in Rolling Stone magazine because from 12 – 2 p.m. today in the Franklin Dining Common, University of Massachusetts students will have the opportunity to be photographed with a white upper lip for a chance to be featured in a milk mustache ad in a future issue.

The photo contest is part of a national program, sponsored by the Milk Processor Education Program, whose goal is to educate college–age men and women about the health benefits of milk.

The UMass finalist, selected by the milk advertising agency, will be honored with their photo in the Daily Collegian and posted on the national milk website at www.whymilk.com.

The winning individual will advance to the national competition for the opportunity to be featured on the cover of Rolling Stone.

The U.S. Department of Agricultural research found eight out of ten college–age women, and more than half of college–age men don't get enough calcium in their daily diets. In fact, studies have shown that students should be drinking around 4–6 cups of milk (2–3 pints) a day to meet the daily requirements.

"There is a real calcium crisis on college campuses across the country," Nancy Dell, a local registered dietitian said. "Too many students are leaving calcium–rich milk at home, not realizing their bones continue to grow past their mid 30's, and they need as much calcium now as they did growing up," she said.

While students may leave milk at home with mom, they're turning to nutrient–vacant drinks, such as soda and coffee, at school.

According to the Milk Education Program, "65 percent of college students surveyed, reported drinking sodas on a regular basis, and they re downing an average of more than a glass (9.8 ounces) each day."

The survey also revealed a national student body who perceive themselves as healthy drinkers, but 34 percent rated soda as the top beverage they "couldn't live without" at school, while only 10 percent cited milk as the pre-

Willey defends letters to Clinton, defends character on 60 Minutes

Claims press seeks to portray her as a "wacko"

By Kalpana Srinivasan
Associated Press

WASHINGTON—Kathleen Willey defended friendly letters she sent to President Clinton after their meeting at which she alleges he made a crude sexual advance. She accused the White House of trying to portray her as a "wacko."

In an interview in the issue of Newsweek on newsstands last Monday, Mrs. Willey said by distributing the letters, which were friendly in tone despite the encounter she alleged, the White House was "trying to make me look like a wacko."

Mrs. Willey also said there was nothing improper about the letters, which she portrayed as a way of trying to secure a job. "I never hid those letters. They were my way of saying, Hello, I'm still out here. I need a job," she said. "I had made a decision that I was going to put that incident behind me. I made that choice, and I'm allowed to make that choice."

In a dramatic television appearance a week ago, Mrs. Willey told CBS' "60 Minutes" that during the 1993 visit, Clinton placed his hands on her breasts, kissed her on the mouth and placed her hand on his genitals after she visited him to discuss her financial troubles.

Mrs. Willey said in the TV interview she was so taken aback by the advance that she wanted to slap Clinton but pushed him away instead and eventually left the office.

Starting two days later, Mrs. Willey began a series of attempts to get back in touch with Clinton. Records released by the White House last week showed Mrs. Willey contacted Clinton's office on Dec. 1 seeking to talk to the president.

Time magazine reported Sunday that a former confidante of Mrs. Willey told the FBI that Mrs. Willey faked a pregnancy in 1995 to seek revenge on a boyfriend. According to the Time on newsstands Monday, the friend, Julie Steele, told investigators Mrs. Willey urged her to go along with the lie and tell the boyfriend Mrs. Willey had a miscarriage, Time reported, without identifying its sources.

Ms. Steele also has claimed that Mrs. Willey asked her to lie to a reporter about the alleged Clinton incident.

Mrs. Willey's lawyer Dan Gecker would not discuss the latest Time report, which he said he had not read. "I haven't seen it, and I'm not going to dignify it," Gecker said Sunday.

Meanwhile, book publisher Mike Viner said on CNN's "Late Edition" that he thought Mrs. Willey "shaded" her version of events as she tried to win a contract for a book on her experiences.

Viner said he began talking with Mrs. Willey's lawyer in early January, and at that time she was "very much pro-Clinton." But this later "changed a great deal to the sort of Anita Hill-want-to-be that I saw on '60 Minutes."

Surgical robot used in assisting military MD's

By Malcolm Ritter
Associated Press

BETHESDA, Md.—It looks like a giant bionic fly that has found work as a tailor.

It looms over a small table, moving its black metal arms and silver pincers quickly and silently. Elbows spread wide and camera-lens eyes unblinking, it deftly sews two rubber hoses together.

About 12 feet away, Army Lt. Col. Christoph Kaufmann leans forward in his chair, peering down into a large black box. Below, he holds scissorlike handles at the end of two mechanical arms. He too makes sewing motions.

In fact, every move of his hands is mimicked instantly by the bionic fly.

It's a little like that scene in "The Wizard of Oz" when Toto pulls back the curtain to reveal the real wizard. And the reality here sounds just as fantastic: The device Kaufmann is demonstrating may one day let surgeons behind the battle lines operate on soldiers at the front.

The bionic fly is called TeSS, for Telepresence Surgery System. The Pentagon has spent about $3 million for its development, and now it's going to find out what TeSS can do.

Within the next few months, Kaufmann and his military colleagues at the Uniformed Services University of the Health Sciences will start putting it to the test, operating on dummies, cadavers and anesthetized animals. And in two or three years, they'll have a better idea how useful it could be on the battlefield.

The idea is to do surgery at the front without putting surgeons in the line of fire. Still, it's clear that TeSS won't replace standard surgical care behind the lines, said Kaufmann, a trauma surgeon who sewed up soldiers in Operation Desert Storm.

Soldiers with simple wounds will still wait to be evacuated. If an explosion blows away half a leg, a medic will still apply a tourniquet and get the soldier to human surgeons fast.

But on some future battlefield, a soldier whose lung has collapsed might be hustled into an armored vehicle, where a surgeon-guided robot slips a tube into his chest. His buddy, whose face is so badly damaged he can't breathe, might inhale again after the robot cuts a hole in his

Jackie Robinson web site

University of Massachusetts history professor Ron Story has received a $5,000 grant from the Five College Multimedia Access Project to develop a web site based on materials from the 1996–1997 Jackie Robinson Initiative.

The Jackie Robinson Initiative was a year–long interdisciplinary program of courses, lectures, and public events commemorating the 50th anniversary of Robinson's breaking the color barrier in Major League Baseball. The program was sponsored by UMass' history, political science, sport studies, and Afro–American departments.

The web site will include video clips of lectures from the Initiative, interviews with Robinson's family, photographs, facsimiles of notable memorabilia and original documents such as original contracts.

Story said by the end of 1998 he hopes to test the site in UMass and high school classes.

Public Health training

UMass Public Health and Health Science professor Gary S. Moore is working with the Massachusetts Association of Health Boards (MAHB), a statewide professional organization to train board of health members in Massachusetts on the most current state laws and regulations.

Moore has been working with the MAHB for the past few years to revise the guidebook that contains critical information for boards of health and has also been conducting training and certification programs for individual board members.

This training program is one of the first of its kind in the country and is being considered as a national model. Funding for the training and certification programs is provided by a Kellogg Foundation grant and the Massachusetts Department of Public Health.

Symposium to honor retired faculty member

The department of landscape architecture and regional planning (LARP) at UMass will host an International symposium on land–use planning Saturday, March 28. The symposium, "Julius Fabos and the METLAND," will recognize UMass faculty member Fabos, who retired last year after 34 years with the department.

Fabos is a pioneer in the landscape planning field and established the Metropolitan Landscape Planning, (METLAND) interdisciplinary research group in 1970. The METLAND group developed procedures for applying landscape planning principles to create sustainable landscapes. The group also advances the use of geographic information system (GIS).

The day long symposium will feature several department alumni who were members of the METLAND group at UMass.

Speakers announced for History and Politics Lecture Series

Writers from the New York Times and the Atlantic Monthly will be featured in UMass' Spring History and Politics Lecture Series announced the co–coordinators, political science professor Jerome Mileur and history professor Ron Story.

On Wed., March 25, Peter Applebome, former national education correspondent for the New York Times will present a lecture based on his book, "Dixie Rising: How the South is Shaping American Values, Politics and Culture."

Applebome began working at the New York Times as a national correspondent in 1986 and became bureau chief in Houston, and from 1989–94 he was Southern bureau chief in Atlanta. Between 1994–98, Applebome was chief national education correspondent, covering both K–12 and higher education. He is now a reporter with the newspaper's culture section.

On Wed., April 22, Peter Kaplan, contributing co–editor of the Atlantic Monthly will speak about, "Was Democracy Just a Moment?" which appeared in the December issue of the Atlantic as part of its "Future of Democracy" series.

Both lectures are in 601 Herter Hall at 3:30 p.m. and are free and open to the public.

Ironically, according to Milk Program studies, "70 percent of these men and women reported their beverage choices are 'healthful' while unanimously agreeing that soda was not good for you."

Caffeinated options may offer students an instant jolt, but excess consumption of caffeine found in some beverages, like soda and coffee, can cause the body to lose calcium and could lead to osteoporosis later in life. Students that drink the standard requirements of milk daily are also less likely to gain the "freshman 15."

"More than three in 10 college students say they've gained weight since they've left home," the Milk Education Program stated.

throat.

Some future version of TeSS might help a medic put packing in a ripped-open abdomen to control bleeding, or put a large intravenous line into a soldier's groin because his arms are too badly burned for a regular IV.

Say a bunch of injured soldiers are contaminated by unknown chemical or biological weapons. Or a soldier is wounded by an unexploded shell that lies like a booby trap in his body.

"I think it would be more appropriate to save a surgeon and put a machine at risk," Kaufmann said.

None of this is will happen anytime soon. It could take five years to 10 years, Kaufmann said.

Still, TeSS is amazing, said his colleague Dr. David Burris. Even with a less advanced version, "I've operated on a pig three stories down in a parking lot — I could sew his gut together just as well as if I were standing beside it."

If you peer down into Kaufmann's black box, grab the scissorlike handles and give TeSS a test drive, you quickly start believing you're wielding those pincers yourself. It's like you're working with two pairs of tongs at a barbecue grill.

You see the pincers on a TV screen, but they appear in three dimensions because of glasses you wear. The pincers respond instantly to your hand motions, and open or close when you manipulate the handles. But most startlingly, you feel what they feel. When a pincer bumps something or pulls the surgical thread taut, you sense the resistance.

The illusion is powerful. Recently, when a reporter tried his hand at operating TeSS, Kaufmann put a needle in one of the pincers and pushed it toward the robot. The reporter jumped back from the box to avoid getting jabbed. Of course, the needle was nowhere near.

TeSS works through a computer that monitors the operator's movements and sends commands to 28 electric motors in the robot. TeSS is connected to the computer and the black box by a bundle of cables that's as thick as Kaufmann's wrist.

And that illustrates a big problem with taking a robot surgeon into the battlefield. Huge amounts of data have to be sloshed back and forth without delay between the robot and the human surgeon. Cables obviously can't be used in battle, and trying to send this data torrent by present-day radio links would be like running a four-lane freeway into a two-lane bridge.

Technological tricks might overcome that, but there are other concerns: What if the enemy jams the signal during surgery? Or what if the robot malfunctions?

Burris suspects that improved training for medics might be a better investment than robot surgeons. He warns that if robot surgeons are deployed, training for medics shouldn't be slighted. When the technology breaks down, Burris said, there's a 19-year-old medic on the ground. "If he's well trained, (he) might be able to save the life of his buddy. If he's not well trained, he might watch his buddy die."

In any case, the first and most widespread uses for machines like TeSS may be far from battlefields.

Civilian surgeons might rehearse operations with such a device, programmed to mimic particular patients, Kaufmann said. If real operations were done through a TeSS-like device, it could be set to keep the surgeon out of dangerous territory. Or it could give a surgeon the equivalent of extremely tiny hands for delicate surgery, by greatly magnifying the surgeon's view while scaling down his motions.

Already, in Europe, a few patients have been operated on with a remote-control surgery device that works through tubes inserted through small holes in the body.

Netanyahu and cabinet reject key peace clause from the United States

By Donna Harman
Associated Press

JERUSALEM— Israel rejected on yesterday a key element of a new U.S. initiative intended to break a stalemate in Israeli-Palestinian peace talks.

Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and his Cabinet ministers unanimously opposed a reported American proposal calling for an Israeli withdrawal from another 13 percent of the West Bank. Cabinet Secretary Danny Naveh said.

Prime Minster Netanyahu

"This figure which has been mentioned in the news media, 13 percent, is unacceptable, and... damaging to the security interests of the state of Israel," Naveh told reporters.

Netanyahu's adviser David Bar-Illan said Washington had not yet submitted the proposal to Israel, but "because it has been advertised from American sources and has not been denied" Israel assumes the reports are true.

Netanyahu telephoned President Clinton on Thursday and Saturday and told him the imposition of any percentage would be a breach of a written promise made by the Clinton administration that Israel alone would decide the extent of the withdrawals, Bar-Illan told The Associated Press.

That promise was made in a letter from then-Secretary of State Warren Christopher, which accompanied the 1996 agreement on Israeli withdrawal in the West Bank town of Hebron, Bar-Illan said. Both the Palestinians and Israelis have expressed reservations about the U.S. plan, which calls for Israel to withdraw troops in phases from about 13 percent of the West Bank in exchange for a Palestinian crackdown on Islamic militants.

U.S. envoy Dennis Ross is to visit Israel and the Palestinian areas later this week to discuss the initiative.

Secretary of State Madeleine Albright called Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat on Saturday to discuss the stalled peace talks. Planning Minister Nabil Shaath said he was not sure if the Palestinians would accept the U.S. initiative but acknowledged that it could be "the last chance to put this peace process back on track."

The Palestinians, who have full or partial control of 27 percent of the West Bank, had hoped to gain control over more.

Netanyahu reportedly wrote Clinton last week that the scope of the withdrawal proposed by the United States would compromise Israel's security.

He also called Clinton twice requesting that the U.S. administration delay publicizing the initiative, the daily Yediot Ahronot said.

The two leaders agreed that the United States would not publish the initiative before the Ross visit, the newspaper said.

'Living wage' bill proposed

By Michelle Locke
Associated Press

OAKLAND, Calif.—Truelia Ann McFarland sees a proposed "living wage" ordinance that would require companies doing business with the city to pay $8 an hour as a stepping stone to hope.

"A person making the minimum wage cannot survive," the home health care worker said. "It would give them an incentive to work a little harder. It would give them an incentive to get up in the morning."

But small-business owner Ana Chretien believes the measure would keep companies from moving to struggling Oakland.

"You scare people off and that's not good for business," she said.

The City Council is due to vote on the proposal last Tuesday night. If the ordinance passes as expected — it was approved 4-0 at a committee hearing earlier this month — Oakland will become the 19th jurisdiction to set a minimum wage for companies that do its work. Oakland's will be one of the strongest. The measure would set a minimum wage of $8 with benefits, $9.25 without, for companies or organizations — including nonprofit — that have either a service contract of at least $25,000 or get $100,000 in subsidies or tax breaks.

The current federal minimum wage is $5.15 an hour.

"What we're seeing is the more recent ordinances are getting stronger and stronger as we get more experience working with living wage policies," said Brian Kettenring, an Oakland organizer with the Association for Community Organizations for Reform Now, or ACORN, which lobbied for the new rules.

Although the ordinance is expected to affect only about 300 to 500 workers, Kettenring calls it "a step in the right direction that helps to address poverty at the local level."

Chamber of Commerce public policy manager Barbara Leslie said the chamber is lobbying the council to take more time to analyze the ordinance and consider allowing more exceptions.

Business officials worry that the ordinance in its present form will hurt efforts to recruit new businesses to town just as Oakland is beginning to recover from the triple whammy of a 1989 earthquake, the early '90s California recession and the 1991 Oakland Hills fire.

"This seems like a crucial moment in Oakland's future growth," Ms. Leslie said.

Mark Weisbrot, who has studied the effects of the first living wage ordinance, enacted in Baltimore in 1994, said those concerns probably aren't justified.

"There was no evidence that businesses responded negatively," said Weisbrot, a research director with the Washington, D.C.-based Preamble Center, which studies economic issues.

On the front lines of the debate, Ms. Chretien, who has run ABC Security Service for 15 years, currently pays employees $6 to $15 an hour. If the ordinance passes, she plans to drop her contract providing security guards at City Hall, a loss of about $550,000 a year.

"It's a good contract; I've had it since 1978. But like any business, you gain some and you lose some," she said. "If I drop that contract, some people in Oakland, they're not going to have that job."

Ms. McFarland, who earns $5.35 an hour taking care of her ailing 75-year-old mother, doesn't expect to directly benefit because she's paid by a county agency.

Survey finds half of probationers used drugs while committing crimes

By Michael J. Sniffen
Associated Press

WASHINGTON— Almost half the men and women on probation in the United States were under the influence of alcohol or drugs when they committed their crimes, the Justice Department said Sunday. The first national survey of probationers, conducted for the Bureau of Justice Statistics, found that 46.8 percent of probationers had used either alcohol, drug; or both at the time of their offense.

This was lower than use among incarcerated criminals at the time of their offenses. Among jail inmates, 60 percent had used alcohol, drugs or both when they committed their crimes; among state prison inmates, the figure was 49 percent.

Alcohol consumption was more prevalent than use of illegal drugs.

Among probationers, 40 percent had consumed alcohol when they committed their crimes and 14 percent used drugs. Probationers who used alcohol along with drugs are counted in both the separate alcohol and drug percentages, which accounts for those two figures totaling more than the combined percentage.

The number of probationers consuming alcohol at the time of their offense was comparable to that of jail inmates, 41 percent, but higher than that of state prisoners, 32 percent.

But drug use by probationers during their crime was far below the figures for jail inmates, 52 percent, or state prisoners, 36 percent.

The most commonly used drug was marijuana. Among all probationers, 67 percent said they had used marijuana or hashish at least once in their lives, 31 percent had used crack or other forms of cocaine, 25 percent had taken stimulants, 20 percent hallucinogens, 15 percent barbiturates and 8 percent heroin or other opiates.

Among all probationers, 35 percent admitted they had at least once consumed as much as a fifth of a gallon of alcohol in one day. That's the equivalent of 20 drinks of liquor, three six-packs of beer or three bottles of wine.

Slightly more than half of all probationers said they had been involved in a domestic dispute while under the influence of alcohol, drugs or both at some time in their lives. Sixty-four percent admitted driving a vehicle under the influence of either or both.

According to the most recent data, there were nearly 3.2 million adults on probation as of Dec. 31, 1996 — double the 1.6 million adults incarcerated.

Probation is used as a lesser penalty than imprisonment, for less serious crimes or criminals with no or few prior convictions. Very rarely does a sentence in such cases include prison time, followed by probation.

Ashes to ashes

Paul Hayes

The death of Andrew B. Sala of Mendon, who died two weeks ago, has set me to thinking about how we — as humans — deal with death. More to the point, it has gotten me to rethink the whole concept of burial.

I may come off as cold and callous, maybe I'm a heretic for saying so, but I think burial is a wasteful practice which serves no purpose. I see it as the final, desperate attempt by people to hold on to their identities. A desperate attempt which ultimately fails.

Remember Jack C. Toney? He killed himself by jumping out of room 1313 in JQA a couple of years ago. I'm sure he has a grave someplace, but he is already being forgotten by us, his fellow students. Soon enough he will become obscure trivia. It is likely Sala also has a grave someplace. And while he is fresh in our minds, and in many of our hearts, the odds are good that he will also be forgotten by many students in a couple of years.

This whole business of memorializing has got to stop.

When I go to graveyards, I see row upon row of forgotten graves. They look nice in movies, and serve as powerful settings for sad characters to return to at poignant moments. But in reality these disposal yards must not be romanticized. They are a cancer which must be stopped, because there is no end to the amount of people who will die. If we keep burying them, we'll eventually run ourselves right out of town.

Our minds and hearts are the only real tombs for our loved ones. These are their final resting places.

Two of my grandparents have been buried while I've been alive. Before they were even cold, the wheels were set in motion for their wakes and subsequent burials. It was as if an alternative was never considered.

I suppose it may have been their last request, their will, to be buried. Maybe it was based on their spiritual beliefs. But whatever the reason, I think they should have been cremated instead.

This whole idea of death being a ritualistic thing, which requires all sorts of established pomp and circumstance must be overcome. I mean, what's the point of tossing these bodies six feet under and then carving their names on a slab of rock?

–Graves and gravestones are only good for drunk teens and pre–teens to smash bottles off of or piss on while they're drinking in the cemetery. Maybe if the name rhymes with something humorous or grotesque these kids can incorporate it into a joke.

I loved my two grandmothers, but I also loved my dog. My dog was cremated before I even had a chance to throw his old water bowl away. He has no grave, he is gone and will be forgotten by the world.

What makes one more important than the other?

Not to disrespect the memories of my grandmothers, but right now they and my dog are of equal stature. They are all gone, they are all just memories. Memories which will fade away.

We have to give up the ghosts of our loved ones. We have to give up building monuments to their demise.

I mean, let's face it, our names and faces and accomplishments will not live on — unless, of course, people see it fit to keep us alive in their thoughts.

At best, graveyards are like a picture. But I was under the impression that art was meant to add to life, –not stifle it.

"Ashes to ashes," a phrase from my (former) religion went. Accordingly, we should just admit the true nature of our existence, and have ourselves burned and our ashes scattered in the wind.

I nearly suggested we should use our bodies as fertilizer, fish food or fuel; but we all eat so much crap that we'd probably only poison ourselves and future generations.

Using land for living is better than using land for dying. All the land we use for graveyards could be open space. Or, at the very least, housing. Either of those would add to the human experience.

I mean, junkyards are inevitable — but these sprawling, egocentric death–yards? Do people need to hold onto their identities so badly?

Protesting activism

Elsa Allen

I am not an activist. I have never been an activist, and I don't plan on becoming an activist at any time in the near future. I don't vote for many things. I don't claim to have some super–important belief that requires me to rally with my fellow brothers and sisters in my "cause."

Sure, I believe in the standards. I'm against racism, sexism, all of your basic –isms. But beyond that there isn't much that inspires me to rally around a microphone and shout my thoughts for all to hear. I spend my days skipping around this campus, attending classes, writing papers, taking exams, and frankly, I don't have much time to spend on the steps of the student union trying to change the world.

But, no matter how apathetic I profess myself to be, there is always some schmuck coming out of the woodwork trying to get me to vote for this or that, sign a petition, join a group or get involved in some respect, when all I really want to do is get a little piece of paper that says I have some sort of degree. If I feel the need to join a struggle it won't be because some lime–green flyer on a bulletin board convinced me to do so.

It is my personal opinion that the activism on this campus has gone the way of "political correctness" and gotten just a tad out of control. There seem to be no limits any more. Now, before I have every member of GEO ready to hang me from the nearest tree, let me say this: Some people have real issues. I'll give them that. Issues that demand a rally, a microphone, maybe even some protest flyers. Some "causes" however, remain questionable.

I think that most of you out there can recall the "Save Our Beer" rallies of last semester. As awe–inspiring and powerful as the sight of a couple hundred plaid–shirt– and white–hat–clad students chanting "Save our beer, save our beer!" is, shivers raced down my spine. As much as I truly wanted to fight for this cause and join my fellow "beer–savers," the swarm of two hundred students confronted with the threat of (gasp!) losing their beer was not a crowd that I wanted to put my physical person in the middle of.

Then there is the case of the ailing SGA elections. Personally, I shy away from the three–letter organizations, simply because they don't seem to like non–activists like myself very much, I was thinking about voting, really I was. Until the week before elections, when I saw a poster that was using the characters of "South Park" as an election strategy. "Kenny says 'vote for so–and–so'" the sign read, with a drawing of Kenny underneath it. Yeah, right. Nice try, but pop culture isn't going to make me rush to the polls.

If someone tried to address me in an intellectual manner, then maybe I would feel obliged to march to the D.C., or wherever they hold the elections these days, and put in my two–cents worth. But I'm not even going to bother if the catchiest things they can come up with are cheesy slogans and a cartoon character that swears to display on posters all over campus.

Personally, I am upset at the flagrant waste of paper that these causes have resulted in. I'm ready to start my own cause and pit MassPIRG against the SGA in an all out war over the slaughter of trees and the use of poisonous inks in campaigning. In fact, I really would do that, if I were an activist, which I have already said I am not.

I have no opinion on the smoking ban in Amherst bars. I am not going to stake myself out in front of Delano's with a mouthful of cigarettes and a picket sign that reads "Save our Butts." Then again, I realize the ban as the oxymoron that it is. If I'm going to go in and destroy my liver, might as well take my lungs too. Either way, people are going to be forced to deal with it. Whining isn't going to help. Neither will a protest.

People are apparently willing to rally around anything these days. We even had a protest to protest the ban on protests, ah, er, or something like that. But, alas, I wasn't at that one either.

So, the UMass community will have to survive without my opinion on the ever–important issues. I think they'll do just fine. My voice won't be heard among the masses, chanting things like "Hey, ho, we're GEO!" And unless there is another war equivalent to the Vietnam War anytime soon, there will be no love–ins for me. I'm just trying to get myself an education. I have enough trouble fighting through the masses to get into the buildings on campus — I don't think I'll be joining their rallies any time soon.

I slept with the president

Chris Stamm

"So, how was your break?" a monotonous voice echoing from a nameless face asks for the umpteenth time today.

With three years of post–spring break depression under my belt, my response breaches that incomprehensible gap between thought and speech in a flash.

"Ah, not bad," I reply. "Got some rest, did some laundry, saw some friends from home, slept with the president, you know, the usual."

My first two spring breaks were highlighted by crashing on my parents' couch watching "Law and Order" reruns while trying to ingest a box of every Hostess snack cake on the market. Last year's break was spent in that Shangrila of spring break lure, Pittsburgh, Pa., watching our beloved Minutemen fall handily to Louisville in The Big Dance. I returned home only to fall into another round of couch dwelling, rerun watching and Hostess snack cake gorging.

This year I was prepared. Better yet, I had a plan.

The agenda was simple: find a job. How hard could that be? I had some interviews, I had some connections, I even had the token interview suit. With a few handshakes and smiles, a new apartment, a new car, in short, a new life would be mine. Little did I know, none of this would matter.

Before embarking on three days of back–to–back–to–back interview hell, I was off to Washington, D.C. to visit a friend from home in hopes of forging some sort of spring break excitement. While deftly manuvering my 1987 mostly– blue Dodge Shadow among bumper–to–bumper Beltway beauracrats, my future was revealed via the urgent voice of AM radio: Yet another woman claims to have been violated by the president.

It seemed as though there was a way to combine some spring break fun with a much–needed job search and still manage to come out on top. In fact, I wouldn't be the first one to do it.

Do you want fame? Do you want fortune? Forget pining over the perfect resume. Forget that interview with your father's lawyer's girlfriend's little brother who knows a guy that has a friend... Forget it, just sleep with the president — or at least say you did.

My mind is incredibly numbed by the recent flurry of allegations. However, this last helping of "he said she said" takes the cake.

Kathleen Willey claims President Clinton made a sexual advance in 1993. She tells one story to her lawyer then changes her tune in a conversation regarding a six figure book deal with publisher Michael Viner. Conveniently, some claim that Willey boasts a six figure debt adding fuel to the testimonies and news reports across the nation. Various friends and foes add their two cents, the media coverage snowballs and the public is left not knowing who to believe.

But they would believe me. I was in town visiting with friends at Georgetown over break. My friend's roommate was a Congressional intern who showed us around the hill — he probably knows some shady intern with an overt political agenda that could fabricate a story worthy of a CNN mention (if not a Washington Post sidebar).

What's more, I would be the first man to come forward knocking the top off the scadal meter that would assuredly gaurantee a made for T.V. movie deal.

That's not to say that Clinton is either innocent or guilty. That's not to say that his predecessors in the White House have not had their share of affairs, public or private. (I'm sure you have all heard the J.F.K defense by now). All of that is beside the point. In fact, there is so much mud flying around the media we'll never know the truth.

The icing on the cake is the fact that each time another woman comes forward, Clinton's approval rating rises. In the days following Willey's claim, the president's rating rose four percent.

Hey, even if my story never garners fame or fortune, even if I have to don the interview suit and tow the line like everyone else, maybe the rise in the president's approval rating stemming from my allegations will further cement his control of the nation, thus solidifying our great nation for a few more months.

Now that's a spring break accomplishment.

Grammy can't save Colvin

Shawn Colvin, hot off the Grammies, gave a cold Holyoke performance March 12.

By Anna Feder and Kevin Monahan

Shawn Colvin
Chapin Auditorium—Mt. Holyoke College
Mar. 12

A large cloud of estrogen passed over Chapin Auditorium at Mount Holyoke College on the night of Thurs, March, 12 as multi-Grammy award winner Shawn Colvin performed her own brand of cookie-cutter formula folk for the VH-1 crowd. Colvin's solo acoustic performance displayed her above average guitar skills and excellent vocal abilities, but her music left much to be desired, sticking to safe terrain for her specialized audience.

Colvin took the stage some two hours after the scheduled start of the show, due to two unexpected opening acts and a backstage injury which did more harm to her guitar than herself. Borrowing an instrument from opener Ana Egge, Colvin appeared on stage dressed in sackcloth, bulging with motherhood, and armed with a hand-made acoustic.

Colvin went for neither quantity nor quality, performing only few of her bland songs, mostly from her latest album A Few Small Repairs, and filling her set with long diatribes about pregnancy, guitars, Grammies, and meeting Bob Dylan. Eventually the audience forgot whether she was there to sing songs or do a stand-up routine.

As Colvin performed even her most popular songs the crowd looked as though they were anesthetized. What little audience vibe there was to speak of came only twice during the show, when Colvin entered, and when she exited.

Colvin's themes range from love, pain, love, flowers, love, happiness, love, loss, and the mother of all clichés "true love." Certainly on an ego trip after winning the top Grammies this year, Colvin felt as if she could walk through her set, and her not even remembering the name of her opening act came across as a bit bitchy.

Success has come at the right time for Colvin, with the success of more talented solo female artists which is the current phenomenon in the music industry today. To say that Colvin's performance was a disappointment is an understatement. Expecting her voice to carry her and riding the wave of her recent Grammy win, Colvin cannot hide the fact that her act is coffee shop music gone corporate, pasteurized for easy digestion.

Portishead works its stage charm

By Kevin Monahan

Portishead
The Palladium—Worcester
Mar. 14

The element of performance is something sadly missing from most concerts as of late. Bands get up on stage, play their songs and say goodbye as they leave, which is all well and good. But a band actually putting on a show for its audience is risky.

The theatrics of the performance can either add to or detract from the music. The latter of which is what the fans come to see. For those lucky enough to be in attendance at the Palladium on the first Saturday of spring break, British trip-hop pioneers Portishead pushed all the right buttons, captivating its audience with spectacle without being overly theatrical.

To see a band with a sound as intricate as Portishead's recreate their material live is a marvel in and of itself. Guitars and drums join forces with upright basses, electric basses, keyboards, sequencers and a tirade of turntables creating a cacophonic orchestra that is beautifully melodic and wildly chaotic.

The opening DJ's set was entertaining despite the fact that it went on too long though it served as an introduction for what was to follow. The last few minutes of the opening set featured video projections of traffic in the UK eventually ending in the band's hometown– Portishead, England.

Opening up with "Numb," the first track of 1994's Dummy, band members Beth Gibbons, Geoff Barrow, Adrian Utely and Dave McDonald immediately commanded attention. Creating an aesthetically beautiful atmosphere, Portishead gave the audience something to look at as well as something to listen to, utilizing the projection screen, saturate colors and the trippiest lighting effects this side of Pink Floyd. But what took center stage was the music.

Beth Gibbons' amazing vocal range was the star of the show, ranging from smoothly serene to cerebrally spooky. The songs performed were an even mix from Dummy and 1997's self–titled masterpiece Portishead, including "Cowboys," "Mourning Air," "Glory Box" and a new rendition of the 1994 radio hit "Sour Times," which was almost unrecognizable at first due to the fiercely raucous way in which it was performed.

Gibbons' nervous stage presence radiated a cute shyness that was both engaging and endearing. She said few words to the audience and spent much of the time that she was not singing turned away from the crowd.

It is truly unfortunate that Portishead's tour is playing so few dates, because this is a band worth traveling to see, and you can be assured, they will make it worth your while.

Tale of the two DiCaprios

Young star upstaged by veterans in Iron Mask remake

By Bryan McAllister
Collegian Staff

THE MAN IN THE IRON MASK
Directed by Randall Wallace with Leonardo DiCaprio, John Malkovich, Jeremy Irons
Playing at Hampshire Six Theaters

Trumpets flare, kings sneer, and Gerard Depardieu flirts with a plethora of young women — it can only be a 90's version of a swashbuckling adventure, the classic Dumas tale of revenge and redemption in beauty–enraptured France of centuries ago. Surprisingly though, The Man in the Iron Mask strolls through its rich, twisting story with some superficial attempts at thrills and emotion. Even Leonardo DiCaprio, the film's sole money making factor, is given little to do in a dual role.

The film looks outstanding, however. Cascading fountains and perfectly–cut greenery lace the outskirts of the Versailles set, where nearly all of the movie's action takes place. Equally effective are the moody, gray dungeons and murky waters of the palace's lower levels. But everything else, down to the charged music score and slow–motion fight scenes, suggests a level of entertainment more inspired by today's action movies than serial classics of old films and novels.

This creates a problem, considering we have a very literal, and very layered (for the genre) story. Ruling France is the ruthless king Louis XIV (DiCaprio), who not only treats his people poorly and threatens to shoot down their revolutionary attempts, but takes after beautiful young women, only to discard them in the morning. He soon sets his eyes upon Christine, a young peasant engaged to an ambitious soldier, Raoul. Immediately, Louis devises a plan to send Raoul to war and get him killed in battle, and then seduces Christine with sweet words of comfort.

Raoul was the son of the aging musketeer Athos (John Malkovich); for Athos, this is the last straw in a series of despotic actions by Louis. He gathers his fellow musketeers (Jeremy Irons and Depardieu) in a plan to overtake the king and bring forth a true leader, a twin–brother prisoner confined in a hideous iron mask, also played by DiCaprio.

Leonardo DiCaprio headlines The Man in the Iron Mask, but the star won't be present at tonight's Academy Awards.

There are a few other subplots, and many good characterizations. Of particular weight is the struggle that the king's top man, a former musketeer played by Gabriel Byrne, goes through between his loyalty to a secret past and the revolution that must inevitably come. And The Man in the Iron Mask is at its best when it lets Malkovich and Irons do a little acting, or lett Depardieu do a little fumbling, even if half the time you can't tell what he's saying. It's funny anyway, but these moments are few and jumbled. The screenplay, by Randall Wallace, who also directed, is bland, overlong and overdone. "I can't offer you riches," pleads Raoul to Christine early in the film. "But I can offer you my heart." Please. For a movie promising big fights and great adventure, there's a little too much talking.

Wallace wrote Braveheart, and you can see some similarities here with that superb film: he loves to dress up his characters and then throw them into courage–testing situations. Unfortunately, Wallace didn't learn much from Mel Gibson and makes a less–than–auspicious directorial debut. Scenes never lag but they never quite pack the necessary punch, either.

Until the end, that is. Many surprises will be revealed and luckily, to the credit of Irons, Malkovich, and Byrne, you'll still be around to care. That ending also has the two DiCaprios feuding, a prince and pauper twist that works best in a haunting ballroom scene, where the musketeers fool Louis by making him think the man in the iron mask is all around him. If only Wallace could have dared to shoot the rest of the picture like this, but he's too hesitant. Even the turn–the–tables, rousing ending plods along like a meal with too many courses. The dessert may be sweet, but by the time you get there you're already full.

As for the two DiCaprios, both are at the function of the script. Those looking for a free–spirited Leonardo a la Titanic will be disappointed. His king is quite good at looking arrogant —and his prisoner equally good at looking naive —but not much else. The camera loves him though, and he somehow even manages to make the king likable. Overall, although not entirely his fault, the dual performance is perfunctory, glossy and overmatched. As is the movie itself — The Man in the Iron Mask wields a big sword but walks too softly. C+ season, didn't disappear in Atlanta. In fact, the mayhem grew louder. And the skepticism that haunted this UMass team at the start of the year — broken up by a brief spell of optimism in February — came back in full force by season's end. None of the things the Minutemen accomplished this season — the 21 wins, winning at Rhode Island and Xavier, reaching as high as No. 18 in the AP Poll, seemed to count as much as the way it ended.

Bitterly.

It's hard to see Saint Louis for what it was — a scrappy, balanced team with a budding superstar in Larry Hughes — because it's Saint Louis, not exactly a basketball powerhouse. We here in Amherst like to think our boys are such a powerhouse; and if you ask, we'll show you the banners hanging up over center court at the William D. Mullins Center. And basketball powerhouses don't shoot 29 percent in the NCAA tournament, or lose in the first round to teams named the "Billikens."

But the Minutemen did, and capped off the worst stretch of basketball played by a UMass team in a very long time in the process. The game itself — a 51–46 final — was as ugly as you'll get in the NCAA tournament, and the only excuse anyone could hold onto — the thought that maybe, just maybe, Saint Louis was a sleeper — was squashed two days later when the Billikens found themselves down to Kentucky 38–11 in the first half.

There were some bright spots for UMass. Sophomore forward Mike Babul did an exceptional job on Hughes defensively, and Tyrone Weeks grabbed 16 rebounds in his final game in a Massachusetts uniform.

And there were plenty of teams that ended the season more disappointed than UMass. Ole Miss, Clemson and South Carolina all suffered the indignity of losing in the first round to schools nobody has really heard of, and Atlantic 10 rivals George Washington, Temple and Xavier were all beaten by lower seeds in the first round. All that would make you think the Saint Louis loss wasn't so tough to take.

But it isn't like that in Amherst anymore. Nobody is just "happy to be there." We fancy ourselves quite the program, and even have a slogan, "UMass basketball," that is supposed to be a style of play that pushed this school from the boonies to the top of the basketball world.

Two years ago we were the best team in America, and everyone seems to think we'll be back there pretty soon.

But in all honestly, we probably won't. It's a tough thing to do, something Kansas and Arizona found out all too bitterly. This year's UMass team was young and inexperienced, and it peaked too early. Nobody seemed to think UMass would go anywhere in October, but after a mid–season winning streak everyone's expectations grew out of control. The Minutemen ended pretty much the way they were supposed to, but that doesn't seem to be good enough anymore.

Next year will be a critical one for this program. Coach Bruiser Flint will have talent, experience and probably a top 20 ranking in the pre–season. Expectations will be high, and justifiably so. But if UMass starts next season the way it ended this one,

Chris Kirkland brought UMass to within a point after two free throws at 9:02. Following a mid–range jumpshot by Chris Heinrich, a marginal bench contributor for the Billikens (22–10), Ajmal Basit scored on a put–back, and Kirkland converted on a short jumper in the lane to give Massachusetts its first lead in over 10 minutes.

This, however, was the second–to–last basket of UMass' whirlwind season.

Hughes hit a trey, then scored on a transition lay–in. After Clarke's jumper, that pulled UMass to 47–46 with under three minutes to play, Hughes hit a pair of turnaround jumpers. The latter came with just under a minute left, and with Babul's hand in his face, and proved to be the stake in UMass' heart.

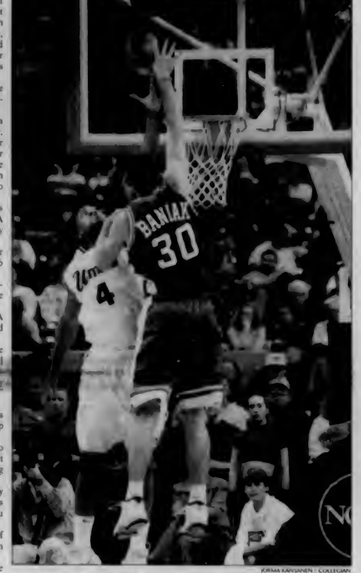
"He's cool–headed," Massachusetts coach Bruiser Flint said of Hughes. "A lot of kids get frustrated when they miss shots early. He didn't."

It was a sad farewell for senior Tyrone Weeks, who recorded 16 rebounds in his final game.

"It's so emotional," Weeks said minutes after the game. "I really don't have any words."

Weeks, who plans to attend NBA rookie camps after the season, looked back on five years in Amherst.

"I grew from a boy to a man. The whole atmosphere around [Amherst] helped change my life, and he was worthy and what's important in life. They gave me a chance to succeed in life," Weeks said.



Flint, who recruited Weeks, was noticeably upset at the loss of his top player and good friend.

"Tyrone has been an inspiration to me," he said. "Coaching isn't about wins and losses. It's about watching men develop.

"He came up to Amherst as an angry young man. But he worked through his problems. He's the kind of kid that you say 'If he can make it, anyone can.'"

Weeks was equally appreciative of Flint, a long–time friend from Philadelphia.

"He's been there for me the last five years," he said. "He's been a father–figure for me when I really needed one."

on the board. Later Brian Langtry fed Brad Obloj to cut the edge to one, before UMass' Mike DelPercio rifled a shot past Spruyt. Hofstra added another pair, and the teams went to the locker room deadlocked.

It was more of the same in the second half, as the teams battled for an advantage. The Minutemen staked themselves to a two–goal lead as McKeefrey and Jancowicz tallied out of the locker room. Michael Laurano and Jarred Testa scored for the Dutchmen, setting the stage for Madigan's heroics.

"It was a big win," Cannella said. "We hadn't played a top team until today."

ing scorer (19.2 points per game), who had been quiet throughout the game, finally heated up with 12:18 remaining in the second half. She quickly erased her previous dismal showing, scoring nine points in 1:49, bringing the score to 53–38.

Freshman Kara Trent got on the board with a breakaway layup at 7:01 after Kraft and MacFarland had bandaged the score at 59–47. But another ghost player for Iowa, senior Angela Hamblin, finally appeared, chipping in a 15–foot pull–up off a steal at 4:04 to spread the lead to 20. Freshman guard Cara Consuegra added to the Hawkeye lead with a three–pointer at 2:55 to make it 70–49. She had doubled her usual point total to eight.

Tudman contributed two points and MacFarland drilled a three off the right wing with 39.4 seconds left but it just wasn't enough. Smith capped off her 32–point effort which included 24 in the second half, with a 2–for–2 trip at the foul line to finalize the score.

"She's big to handle," O'Brien said of Smith. "Every time we were able to push back till the end when they took it away."

Despite being outsized by the twin towers of Smith (6–foot–3) and Herric (6–foot–4), UMass still snagged 35 rebounds, with Kraft, Rayside, Coyner and MacFarland all grabbing four apiece. The Hawkeyes raked in 41.

Refocusing in the second half, Iowa double and triple–teamed Kraft, minimizing her mobility. Another key to the change in the flow of the game was the improved shooting for Iowa. The Hawkeyes had only shot 11–for–31 for .355 in the first half but they improved to .463 from the field in the second half.

"We relaxed, we looked at the basket, and we got better shots," Smith said.

O'Brien credited her entire team, especially the seniors, for the contributions they had made to the program in their second big dance experience.

"They took a good ribbing and they got back in there," O'Brien said. "They gave it everything they had and left it on the floor.

"The leadership was absolutely unbelievable [from co–captains Mitchell and Tudman]. You've just got to give the best you can, whatever level, and those two did that. Now it's up to [the rest of the team] to live up to what they've done."

Mitchell, UMass' all–time assist leader, finished the game with a game–high 11 assists to round out her career with 378.

This 1998 team did not disappoint anyone. After losing their top scorer, sophomore Kelly Van Hulsen, to an ACL injury on Dec. 11, and Jaywana Bradley to summer surgery on her left knee (ACL), the Minutewomen had to recreate their offense and gel once again. After struggling 5–6 through the rest of December and January, they fought back for a perfect month of February, including winning 9 of their last 10 games.

This season also included many personal achievements. O'Brien passed the UMass all–time coaching wins mark with 93, beating Virginia Tech on Jan. 4, 58–56. She surpassed the centennial mark on Feb. 12 when UMass defeated Fordham, 54–47. Mitchell was awarded second team All–Conference in the A–10 as Kraft earned third team All–Conference.

The team captured the A–10 East title on the final day of the season for the first time in UMass history, beating St. Bonaventure, 65–54. The Minutewomen had also reached the A–10 tournament finals for the first time ever before losing to the Virginia Tech, 66–64. Tudman and Kraft were named to the All–Tournament team as Kraft also earned Tournament Most Valuable Player accolades.

Little Lee nabs MVP in Cardinal win

UK gets monkey off its back to lock up Final Four

ST. LOUIS (AP) — Arthur Lee, the little guy on a huge team, carried Stanford to the Final Four for the first time in five decades.

In a riveting comeback, Stanford unraveled Rhode Island's dream season as Lee scored 13 of his 26 points in the final 2:04 and made a steal that led to a critical basket.

The third–seeded Cardinal rallied from a six–point deficit with 59 seconds left to beat the No. 8 seed, 79–77, yesterday for the Midwest Regional title.

"It's really unbelievable," Stanford coach Mike Montgomery said. "It was looking like we were in trouble — then bang! These guys have a lot of heart, a lot of character."

Stanford (30–4), which last reached the Final Four in its championship season of 1942, will meet Kentucky next Saturday at San Antonio.

The victory by Stanford dealt a crushing end to Jim Harrick's season. The coach, who won a national title at UCLA in 1995 but was dismissed in disgrace, had taken Rhode Island in his first year to the threshold of the Final Four.

Lee, a 6–footer who had been unfavorably — and, perhaps, unjustly — compared to former Stanford star Brevin Knight, was named the region's MVP for taking the Cardinal where Knight couldn't.

Lee's steal from Cuttino Mobley led to Mark Madsen's three–point play with 26.2 seconds left to give Stanford the lead for good. He clinched the victory with two free throws with 4.2 seconds left. He was 26–for–26 from the line in the tournament.

Tyson Wheeler scored 24 points but missed three crucial late free throws for Rhode Island (25–9), still seeking its first Final Four appearance. The Rams had knocked off top seed Kansas in the second round.

Mobley added 20 points for the Rams, who did a great job against the much taller Cardinal players. With 7–foot–1 Tim Young and the 6–8 Madsen neutralized most of the game, it fell upon Lee to take over.

And that's just what he did after Rhode Island took a 66–60 lead.

ST. PETERSBURG, Fla. (AP) — Just like 1992, Kentucky erased a big second–half lead in its NCAA regional final against Duke. Only this time, the Wildcats erased the memory, too.

The Wildcats, haunted for six years for losing to Duke in perhaps the greatest college game ever played, rallied from an 18–point deficit to beat the top–seeded Blue Devils, 86–84, yesterday in the South Regional final.

Just like six years ago in Philadelphia, Duke (32–4) trailed in the final seconds and had a chance to win it with a buzzer–beater. But freshman William Avery couldn't replicate Christian Laettner's shot–heard–round–the–world jumper that ended Duke's 104–103 victory that year, missing a running 30–footer off the backboard as time expired.

Kentucky (33–4), the No. 2 seed, plays Stanford in the Final Four on Saturday in San Antonio. A win would send the Wildcats to their third consecutive national championship game, this time against either Utah or North Carolina, but their first under new coach Tubby Smith.

The hottest team in college basketball with 11 consecutive victories, the Wildcats fell behind by 18 points — 38–20 — after a 17–0 Duke run and trailed 69–52 with just over 10 minutes left. But the Wildcats then started doing everything they hadn't until that point — making their outside shots, denying Duke at the defensive end and limiting the Blue Devils to just one shot.

Horoscopes

ARIES (March 21–April 19) — Be persistent in your attempt to contact someone who has the information you need to complete a pivotal task on schedule. Do not get lazy!

TAURUS (April 20–May 20) — You are going to have to keep track of all that is happening around you today if you're also to know what must be done tomorrow.

GEMINI (May 21–June 20) — A change of plans may be just around the corner, but you're unwilling to acknowledge that you must be flexible as you approach a turning point.

CANCER (June 21–July 22) — You are not likely to encounter much difficulty this week where others are concerned. Your internal drive may wax and wane.

LEO (July 23–Aug. 22) — Collaborative efforts may prove difficult this week, as one member of your team is unwilling to share ideas as openly as others are.

VIRGO (Aug. 23–Sept. 22) — You must not be timid where criticism is concerned, for it is only through open and honest assessment that improvements can be made today.

LIBRA (Sept. 23–Oct. 22) — You are going to have to get over a few of your own preferences today if you expect to do business with those who might go elsewhere.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23–Nov. 21) — Take care you're not being unfair to a friend by judging him or her before all the results are tallied. Do not be ruled by knee-jerk reactions.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22–Dec. 21) — You may be waiting for an apology from someone who, only yesterday, crossed the line at the workplace. Do not be tempted to retaliate.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22–Jan. 19) — There may be no way to tell if you are doing things the right way today, but you'll want to continue along this path for at least another day.

AQUARIUS (Jan 20.–Feb. 18) — Starting will prove the most difficult part of the day, and the later you do it the more unlikely you will be to achieve a primary goal.

PISCES (Feb 19–March 20) — You may be expecting some compensation for a service that someone else thinks was a free gesture. Clear up this confusion today!

Men's, women's basketball fall in NCAA openers

JORMA KANSANEN · COLLEGIAN

Sophomore Mike Babul's defensive effort against Saint Louis' Larry Hughes, one of the nation's best freshmen, was a high point for UMass in the NCAA tournament.

Freshman Hughes Billikens' powerful second–half force

ATLANTA — When the brackets for the NCAA tournament were revealed two Sundays ago, the game plan for the Massachusetts men's basketball team seemed almost too simple.

All UMass, more specifically Mike Babul, had to do was keep Larry Hughes — the nation's top freshman and the Saint Louis Billikens' prize possession — from putting up career numbers, then the Minutemen would have an open ticket to the round of 32, and a date with the Kentucky Wildcats.

Saint Louis	51
Massachusetts	46

Things didn't work out quite as planned, as college basketball often dictates and Saint Louis, despite a heroic defensive performance from Babul, pulled off the upset last Friday at the Georgia Dome, 51–46.

Babul held Hughes to just one first–half field goal, that coming on an uncontested lay–in following a long rebound and a three–pointer missed by Monty Mack.

However, the sophomore forward was alone in the effort. The Minutemen, who finished their season at 21–11, shot only eight percent in the first half and 29 percent for the game. UMass trailed at the half, 27–25, following a shot clock buzzer–beater by Virgel Cobbin (11 points).

Still, UMass had a shot to win at the end. After falling behind by seven, following a pair of Hughes free throws, the Minutemen began a comeback with just under 15 minutes to play.

Charlton Clarke hit a runner and Mack came off a high screen to knock down a 16–foot jumper. UMass trailed, 38–35.

Senior Tyrone Weeks closed out his career in a UMass uniform in the Minutemen's 51–46 first round loss to Saint Louis in the NCAA tournament.

Maybes cloud UM's tournament loss

ATLANTA— If there was ever a sequence that symbolized the Massachusetts men's basketball team's 1997–98 season, it happened late in the first half of March 13th's season–ending loss to Saint Louis.

Billiken guard Tyrone Cobbin put Saint Louis up, 27–25, with a floating jump shot from behind the backboard, and with time running out in the half, UMass guard Charlton Clarke threw up a three–pointer.

From the release, the ball floated true, and rattled in the cylinder. For a second it looked as though maybe, just maybe, this would be the Minutemen's day.

Maybe, just maybe, they would catch a break.

Maybe, just maybe, they'd get that chance to play Kentucky in the second round, and show the world that nasty little slide that ended their regular season was an aberration.

Maybe, just maybe, they'd make us believe again.

But then the ball somehow rattled out, and UMass never did get that chance.

All those maybes, the maybes that the Minutemen were tagged with all

Iowa halts women's hoop season

By Kathleen Ralls

IOWA CITY — This game in many ways was similar in strategy and execution to the regular season.

There's an opposing marquee player; pay close attention to her and the rest of her team will collapse. Maybe she will earn her game average by the end, but it will be too little, too late. The Massachusetts womens basketball team's balanced attack would rule as it had supremely through the entire month of February.

But this time, this game, it was a little different. UMass, (9–11) in its second appearance in the NCAAs, would only make a brief stay. As the No. 13 seed in the Mideast, the Minutewomen squared off against No. 4 Iowa (18–12) in the first round at the Carver–Hawkeye Arena in Iowa City on March 13.

They fell, 77–59, to a seemingly omnipotent Hawkeye squad, which never lost the lead. Four years ago, this Iowa senior class had been tabbed as the most talented recruiting class that year. The Hawkeyes had Tangela Smith, the 1998 Big 10 Player of the Year. They were expected to win multiple national championships and crown themselves annual victors in their conference.

But through their previous three years they hadn't lived up to their expectations, and 1998 was their last season to take what was supposed to be theirs.

The Minutewomen, although a force in the Atlantic 10, had little experience with national powerhouses or even Top 25 mainstays. The game was a tribute to the seniors, Sabriya Mitchell and Kara Tudman, and their ability to stick–to–it and fight through the loss of key injured players and put together a successful season.

Iowa dominated the opening minutes, racing off on a 13–0 run as Amy Herrig and Nadine Domond combined for 11 points. Herrig would finish with a double–double of 14 points and 10 rebounds. UMass called a timeout at 18:10 to comb out their jitters.

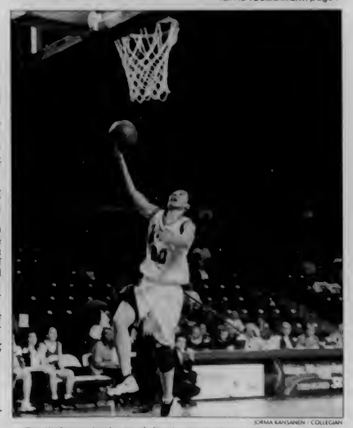
"We came out extremely nervous," UMass coach Joanie O'Brien said. "You can try and con yourself that you're not nervous but you really are and you should be."

Tez Kraft broke the silence and retaliated with a jumper and subsequent foul at 15:57 to make it 13–3.

The Hawkeyes would continue their romp until 6:07 when Kraft blinded them with a shooting clinic, going 7–of–9 including a perfect 3–for–3 from behind the three–point line for a first half total of 18 points.

"It seemed like it was going to be one of those nights," Kraft said of her first half scoring. "At first I didn't think they were going to respect me."

"We were preparing for Tez Kraft," Iowa coach Angie Lee said. "We had vocalized it very clearly [all week] but they've got to see it to believe it."



Freshman Kathy Coyner and Yolanda Rayside were the other Minutewomen scorers with three and four points, respectively. Mitchell lent a helping hand, dishing out five assists. Despite the early shakeup, UMass had battled back to get within three points of Iowa, 28–25, at halftime.

"I said they were scrappy and they were scrappy, they were fighters," Lee said. "They could have easily walked out in the first five minutes, but they fought right back."

Mirroring much of the first half, Iowa rang up 10 points compared to a Rayside tally to force the score to 38–27 and another Massachusetts timeout at 17:13. Sparking the offense as they had for much of the season, Coyner and Alison MacFarland bolstered UMass back into the game. They teamed up for 11 points, including two three– pointers to shoulder the team to within two points at 42–38.

That was the last time the Minutewomen would be able to contain the Hawkeyes. Smith, the team's lead-

Madigan, McKeefrey send Hofstra home unhappy

Massachusetts men's lacrosse coach Greg Cannella knows what kind of potential freshman John Madigan has locked inside him.

The Hofstra Flying Dutchmen now know as well.

Madigan's potential became reality in the clutch for the Minutemen yesterday, as they topped Hofstra, 7–6, at Richard F. Garber Field.

Massachusetts	7
Hofstra	6

"I'm real happy for him," Cannella said of Madigan. "He's a guy we think has loads of potential. I hope this helps his confidence."

Madigan thinks it will.

"This was real big for me. It was a big confidence builder," Madigan said. "This was a big game for us. It's probably the biggest game I've ever played in."

Madigan and the Minutemen almost didn't get the chance to even play, however. Originally scheduled for Saturday at 2 p.m., the contest was moved to noon yesterday as snow blanketed New England early in the weekend. When Mother Nature showed little sign of slowing yesterday morning, the game was further pushed back.

What resulted was a hard fought game in the schools' heated rivalry.

"I wanted this game. I wanted to beat Hofstra in the regular season. And I wanted to play against Spruyt," said UMass goalie John Kasselakis, who came down with food poisoning Saturday night and battled dry heaves throughout the game. "I had to play."

Kasselakis indeed came to play, as he registered 10 saves.

The Minutemen took advantage of the Dutchmen's hesitation, jumping out to a 3–0 advantage. Martens started the afternoon's scoring coming close on Spruyt's left, where he faked high and shot low with only two minutes off the clock.

Mike McKeefrey, whose family was among the volunteers who cleared Garber Field, followed his teammate's example after taking a pass from sophomore Alex Racioppi right in front of the net.

McKeefrey then one–timed a Mike Janowicz pass to give UMass the 3–0 edge with 10:16 to go in the opening quarter.

Two minutes later Hofstra came alive. Bob Parrinelli got the Dutchmen

Alvarez resigns from SGA; elections are not ratified

By Jill Carroll
Collegian Staff

In another surprising turn of events surrounding the University of Massachusetts Student Government Association (SGA) elections for president and student trustee, Carlos Alvarez resigned as Chancellor of Elections, further complicating the election ratification process.

In a signed note given to the Massachusetts Daily Collegian March 12, Alvarez resigned as Chancellor of Elections.

A report has to be given to the speaker of the senate's office 48 hours after the elections are closed in order for the senate to ratify the elections.

As Chancellor of Elections, Alvarez was holding many important pieces of information needed for this report when he resigned.

"He left with all the information needed to be handed in," Lisa Cook associate speaker of the SGA said. "You need to file a report within 48 hours of the closing of the elections that has the election tallies, any formal complaints filed during the elections and the signatures of the elections commission," Cook said.

However Alvarez said he did compile a report but the elections commission would not sign it. The report he did not sign was one compiled by the elections commission.

"I submitted a report to the commission but they felt it wasn't complete. They wanted to write up another report. I said my report was complete. I signed the original report. They made another report and I didn't sign it" Alvarez said.

Alvarez was not worried about the confusion the lack of a report and his resignation caused.

"It's their problem because I'm not involved anymore and they have to deal with it. I did my best and I got sent straight to hell for it," Alvarez said.

Because the report was not turned in, the senate cannot vote on the elections. The constitution does not have any by– laws concerning procedure if the report is not turned in so there is confusion as to what to do next.

"There is nothing in the constitution to direct us on where to go. There is no solution," Cook said.

Despite confusion about procedure, there is a hierarchy that is going to be followed in order to fill the vacant president position. Cook explained the procedure in the constitution that will be followed:

"Because the elections could not be ratified the seat of president is considered vacant. According to the SGA constitution if the position is vacant when the current president's term is over, the speaker of the senate will become the president. The associate speaker will become the speaker," Cook said.

Cook will move up from associate speaker to speaker and Peter Kilbourne, current Speaker will

Kenyan students riot over requirements

NAIROBI, Kenya (AP) — Police clashed with thousands of students who threw stones and burned cars in the Kenyan capital yesterday to protest lower admission requirements to their medical school. One policeman was seriously injured when he was hit in the head by a stone during the rampage outside the University of Nairobi's downtown campus. Five other officers were injured — three seriously — when they tried to break up the rioting crowd.

After a day of running battles, authorities ordered the university closed late yesterday and sent all the students home. About 3,000 students took part in the riots, chasing away dozens of riot policemen with stones and setting three vehicles ablaze, including a van from the state-owned Kenya Broadcasting Corp. The students also beat up a reporter from a newspaper owned by President Daniel arap Moi's Kenya African National Union party.

Boy Scouts free to set membership standards

SAN FRANCISCO (AP) — The Boy Scouts are not covered by California civil rights laws and can exclude gays, agnostics and atheists, the state Supreme Court ruled yesterday.

In a pair of unanimous decisions, the court said the Scouts are not a business and therefore are free, like any private club, to set their own membership policies.

One ruling upheld a decision by a Contra Costa County Scout organization in 1981 to reject Timothy Curran, an 18-year-old former Eagle Scout, as an assistant scoutmaster after he disclosed in an interview that he was gay.

The other ruling involved 9-year-old twin brothers, Michael and William Randall, who were barred by an Orange County Cub Scout den in 1990 after they refused to declare a belief in God.

The twins were allowed into the Scouts by lower-court rulings and recently qualified to become Eagle Scouts, Scouting's highest honor, subject to approval by the national organization. They and their father, James G. Randall, who is also their lawyer, say the boys are agnostics who haven't yet worked out their religious beliefs.

Yeltsin shocks Russians, fires his entire Cabinet

By Mitchell Landsberg
Associated Press

MOSCOW — President Boris Yeltsin picked a little-known reformer as acting prime minister yesterday after firing his entire Cabinet without warning. He promised that Russia's biggest government shakeup since the Soviet Union dissolved would not derail democratic and free-market reforms.

Yeltsin shocked many Russians when he dismissed the Cabinet, including his stolid and loyal prime minister, Viktor Chernomyrdin. Few had ever heard of the man named as Chernomyrdin's acting replacement, Sergei Kirienko.

Despite the shakeup, leaders from Yeltsin on down insisted Russia was not teetering on the verge of a political crisis. "There is no governmental crisis in the country," Chernomyrdin said after losing the job he had held since 1992. "This is a natural and routine process of renewing power. One thing is clear: The course of reforms in Russia is irreversible."

Most Cabinet members were ordered to stay on temporarily and many, including Foreign Minister Yevgeny Primakov, were expected to keep their posts.

In Washington, State Department spokesman James Foley said Secretary of State Madeleine Albright will discuss implications of the changes with Primakov during a previously arranged meeting today in Bonn, Germany.

President Clinton, traveling in Africa, said Yeltsin's action is not likely to harm the partnership he has been trying to build with Moscow.

One symbol of U.S.-Russian cooperation has been Vice President Al Gore's frequent meetings with Chernomyrdin. Their last meeting, just 10 days ago, produced a flurry of accords and good will. Yeltsin said he needed a fresh government to re-energize economic reforms, which he said were moving too

A warm start to Clinton's Africa trip

By Terrence Hunt
Associated Press

ACCRA, Ghana — Buoyed by the biggest crowd of his presidency, President Clinton hailed "the new face of Africa" and its growing peace, prosperity and democracy as he opened a historic six-nation tour yesterday.

While poverty and war still trouble parts of the continent, Clinton said Americans must shake off "the stereotypes that have warped our view and weakened our understanding of Africa." Dictatorships have fallen in many countries, Clinton said, and half of the 48 nations of sub-Saharan Africa now have elected governments. Where business was once stifled, "now Africans are embracing economic reform," the president said on a mission to applaud political reforms and open the door for U.S.-African trade.

Clinton's message was almost lost to a few seconds of dramatic video that showed him being jostled by an enthusiastic crowd. After waiting for hours in temperatures that hovered near 100 degrees, the massive crowd roared at the sight of Clinton in Independence Square, a sprawling parade ground alongside the Gulf of Guinea. After weeks of sex-scandal publicity back home, the White House happily passed along Ghanaian government estimates of more than 500,000 people, although that number seemed high. Clinton's press secretary said the audience was "the largest he's seen as president, maybe one of the largest any American president has ever seen."

Last July's visit to Bucharest, Romania, cheered by tens of thousands, had been the previous benchmark. But the huge turnout and intense heat brought problems. Crowds surged toward Clinton to shake his hand, endangering people pressed against metal barriers. An obviously alarmed Clinton waved crowds to stop, and he shouted, "Back up! Back up!" Spokesman Mike McCurry said Clinton was worried about the people in front being injured.

Fights broke out in the crowd over scarce bottles of water. Police and military security whipped people with belts and canes to keep order. Thousands of people drifted away from the square as the ceremony droned on.

Accra, once an Atlantic port for slave traders, was the gateway for Clinton's 12-day, 21,000-mile journey to Ghana, Uganda, Rwanda, South Africa, Botswana and Senegal. Over the course of the trip, he will spend about 42 hours on Air Force One.

Eleven people killed in Pennsylvania cabin fire early Sunday

By Aliah D. Wright
Associated Press

HERNDON, Pa. — They headed north to the wild beauty of a cabin in the mountains, 11 young people, all friends looking forward to a weekend of cards, cooking and laughter.

By daybreak Sunday, all of them were dead, caught in their beds by a swift fire.

Little remained yesterday of the two-story cabin on Madisonburg Mountain except a tin roof, bent in the middle and draped like a tent over the stubs of charred supports. The cause of the blaze was under investigation.

The victims were in their late teens and early 20s, and all were from Herndon, a close-knit rural town in central Pennsylvania. Some were going to Line Mountain High School; the rest had graduated and were in college or working.

The reaction in their hometown — where only 514 high school students live in an area almost as large as Philadelphia — was grief and disbelief.

Veterans of another tragedy — the explosion of Paris-bound TWA Flight 800 off New York's Long Island in 1996 — came to help console them. Of the 230 people killed in the disaster, 21 were from Montoursville, 35 miles from Herndon. Most of them were members of the high school French Club.

Classes were suspended yesterday at Line Mountain High so students could instead talk about the fire and the victims. Many spoke to members of the same county crisis team that offered consolation to Montoursville residents two years ago.

On their way home, students wore memorial lapel ribbons in the school's colors, blue and gold, and left banners in the auditorium. "We will miss you guys. Hope you have a good trip," read one. "It's going to take an entire village to soothe the soul of our entire community here today," Principal Alexander Menio Jr. said. Karen Wiest, the mother of two victims, 20-year-old David and 17-year-old Toby, said: "The community is very strong and the people will pull together. They will get through this."

Officials had not released a list of the victims by Monday afternoon. The only word of identifications came from relatives. The 11 friends arrived on the mountain Friday night and were planning to go home Sunday, said John Wehry, the uncle of three victims.

Police said a passerby saw lights in the windows and nothing unusual at 3:10 a.m. Sunday. When officers arrived at 5:20 a.m., the cabin was engulfed in flames.

slowly, jeopardizing the future of democracy in Russia.

"I believe that recently the government has been lacking dynamism and initiative, new outlooks, fresh approaches and ideas. And without this, a powerful breakthrough in the economy is impossible," he said, speaking slowly and calmly in a nationwide television broadcast.

The Russian economy actually has begun to show signs of growth after years of decline. But as Yeltsin acknowledged, it has been too little, too late for many people.

Yeltsin fires deputies frequently, and is known for a strategy of shifting blame to others for perceived failures of his government. But Chernomyrdin had survived so long that many considered him untouchable.

"It came as a total surprise," said Gennady Seleznyov, the speaker of the State Duma, the opposition-controlled lower house of Parliament.

Yeltsin indicated he had a candidate for prime minister, but did not reveal his choice. His press secretary, Sergei Yastrzhembsky, told NTV television that Kirienko was the "most likely" candidate for the post.

Yeltsin has two weeks to nominate a candidate for approval by the Duma, which has frequently criticized the government's reform policies and is not likely to give its consent easily.

As the day wore on, speculation grew about what the changes would mean.

Was Yeltsin freeing Chernomyrdin to run for president in 2000? The president seemed to say so, telling Chernomyrdin to begin preparations for the campaign.

Or was he handing a victory to billionaire financier Boris Berezovsky, who has feuded with Yeltsin's two leading reformers, Boris Nemtsov and Anatoly Chubais?

Berezovsky had mounted a vicious media campaign in recent weeks, demanding the reformers' dismissal, while they responded with charges that the tycoon was plotting to take control of the economy.

Berezovsky, who with other wealthy businessmen financed Yeltsin's 1996 re-election campaign, was dismissed from the Security Council last fall after clashing with Chubais.

Or was the choice of Kirienko as acting prime minister an endorsement of Nemtsov, the young deputy prime minister whose political star had appeared to be dimming?

Kirienko, 35, is from Nemtsov's hometown of Nizhny Novgorod, and served as Nemtsov's deputy before becoming fuel and energy minister last November.

"It shows me that Mr. Nemtsov's position in the future government will be rather stronger than in the previous one," said Nikolai Petrov, a political analyst with the Carnegie Endowment for Peace.

He described Kirienko as "the most effective manager in Nemtsov's team," but a man of far-too-limited experience to become an effective prime minister.

Yeltsin's action was hailed by the communist-led opposition, which called it long overdue.

"Communists have never trusted this course or this government or believed that it could manage the tasks it faced," said Communist Party leader Gennady Zyuganov.

But it seemed unlikely that the communists would be any happier with a new Yeltsin government — except to the extent that it excludes their most hated foe, Chubais, the architect of Russian privatization and one of the country's least popular men.

Chubais was tarnished last year for accepting a $90,000 advance on a yet-to-be-published book that critics have called a de facto bribe.

The dismissals of Chernomyrdin and his top aides were expected to shake the confidence of foreign investors and aid donors, who have been playing a major role in supporting the struggling Russian economy.

The Moscow Stock Exchange plunged on news of the dismissals but steadied after Yeltsin's television address.

become president."

However Kilbourne will be graduating, leaving the president position vacant again. Cook will move up again to fill the presidential space.

"Peter [Kilbourn, current speaker of the senate] is graduating and the president's term is for a year so that means that I'll be president," Cook said.

The position of student trustee will be left vacant.

There was a meeting held last night in an effort to change the by-laws of the constitution to provide a procedure in the absence of the report but it was unsuccessful.

"In order to make changes it effects next years elections. It wouldn't be able to change this years elections," Cook said.

In order to hold new elections there will have to be a new Chancellor of Elections appointed. This could add up to 30 more days to the election process.

A heart-stopping rendition of the Andrew Lloyd Webber rock opera.

The Messiah is coming! The UMass Theatre Guild's spring musical Jesus Christ Superstar hits Bowker Auditorium March 25-28. With a fresh twist on the popular A. L. But don't be fooled by the glittering lights and fabulous characters. "This is a story about love, intimacy, and poignant human need that is not fulfilled in this world," Fisk said, "It's a tragedy about the loss of an enlightened one. It tells the audience as to show that it's not too late to embrace one another."

Ghana

ulation of Sub-Saharan Africa is projected to double to 1.5 billion in 27 years.

Clinton's journey is the longest foreign trip of his presidency and the first time an American president has visited any of the six countries on his trip map.

"It is a journey long overdue," the president said.

"I want to build a future partnership between our two people and I want to introduce the people of the United States through my trip to the new face of Africa."

Clinton and his national security aides were distracted by news from Moscow that President Boris Yeltsin had fired his Cabinet, though the president said there was no reason to believe that U.S.-Russian policy would be affected.

Sitting in oversized wing chairs under an umbrella protecting them from the midday sun, Clinton and President Jerry Rawlings of Ghana watched dancers in native costumes move to the pounding of African drums. Clinton's wife, Hillary, and Rawlings' wife, Nana, sat nearby on the red carpeted stage.

Rawlings has held power since a military coup in 1981. He has run in two elections, winning easily both times. He assured Clinton that Ghana is committed to freedom and justice and — in terms of trade — is "ready and able to do business in today's liberalized and competitive market place."

"Africa is not going to be found wanting as we approach the 21st century," said Rawlings, wearing a batakari, a smock-like shirt with leopard trim. Clinton posed for pictures draped in colorful kente cloth, and his wife wore a kente cloth shawl. Clinton's Independence Square speech was a scene-setting address for the entire trip.

"My dream for this trip is that together we might do the things so that 100 years from now, your grandchildren and mine will look back and say this was the beginning of a new African renaissance," Clinton said.

"With a new century coming into view, old patterns are fading away," he said. "The Cold War is gone. Colonialism is gone. Apartheid is gone. Remnants of past troubles remain, but surely there will come a time when everywhere reconciliation will replace recrimination."

Yet, Clinton acknowledged that Africa is not free from peril. He cited genocide in Rwanda, civil wars in Sierra Leone, Liberia, Congo and the Republic of Congo, a military dictatorship in Nigeria and continent-wide poverty, malnutrition, disease, illiteracy and unemployment.

Ghana is considered one of Africa's success stories, with a 3 percent economic growth rate. Yet, a severe drought has caused an energy crisis resulting in regular power outages of 12 hours a day. Clinton told Rawlings the United States will guarantee a $67 million loan from the Transportation Department for the purchase of two barge-mounted power plants from the Westinghouse Corp. After a daylong stay, Clinton flew to Uganda, arriving after 1 a.m. local time in a light drizzle. But first the president visited with Peace Corps volunteers, noting that Ghana was the first country where Peace Corps worked.

Friends of Monica Lewinsky pursued by Starr

By Larry Margasak
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Without Monica Lewinsky's testimony, Whitewater prosecutors have been turning to her 20-something friends to see if she told them the same story of a presidential affair and cover-up that was secretly recorded by an older confidante.

Prosecutors flew one college friend all the way from Japan and two others from California to face the grand jury. A fourth made the well-traveled drive from the White House to the U.S. courthouse about 10 minutes away.

"We gave them her phone book and they've called everybody," Ms. Lewinsky's co-counsel Nathaniel Speights said. "They don't have any firsthand knowledge."

Despite such complaints, individuals familiar with the matter say White House staffer Ashley Raines, 26, who was friendly with Ms. Lewinsky, heard the ex-intern describe a relationship she said she had with the President. A second friend, Neysa Demann Erbland, 24, has reportedly given a similar account.

Unlike some of the more famous witnesses appearing before the grand jury, these friends of Ms. Lewinsky arrive at the courthouse without fanfare, sending reporters scrambling to learn their identities.

"I think this is just the drip torture technique that Ken Starr is using on her," Dr. Bernard Lewinsky, Monica's father, told The Associated Press yesterday. "He is just trying to torture her in every possible way."

Lewinsky said his daughter's friends, like her in their mid-20s, "are being inconvenienced not only by virtue of having to travel to Washington but also because they are being put at financial risk. These are all young people and they all have to hire attorneys that cost money."

Former prosecutors defended Starr's tactics.

"Starr is trying to prove what took place by statements Lewinsky made to her closest friends, when she had less of a motive to fabricate a story, before this became public," said Bruce Yannett, who was a prosecutor in the Iran-Contra investigation. "It would put a tremendous amount of pressure on Ms. Lewinsky, if she would testify, to be truthful," he said.

Starr is investigating whether Ms. Lewinsky had a sexual relationship with the president and then was encouraged to lie about it by Clinton and presidential friend Vernon Jordan in exchange for help finding a job.

The President and Jordan deny the allegations. In her affidavit in the Paula Jones sexual harassment case, Ms. Lewinsky denied an affair. But she did describe a relationship in conversations with Pentagon staff member Linda Tripp, 48, that were secretly recorded. In addition to asking Ms. Lewinsky's friends about their conversations, prosecutors could be looking for any electronic messages or letters to corroborate the recorded chats between the former White House intern and Ms. Tripp.

Summoned to the grand jury so far were Catherine Allday Davis, 24, a former college classmate of Ms. Lewinsky who now lives in Japan; Ms. Erbland, of Los Angeles; Natalie Ungvari, 24, also a friend from Los Angeles, and Ms. Raines, who works in the White House Office of Management and Administration.

Starr also sent prosecutors to Portland, Ore., to speak with Andy Bleiler and his wife, Kathy, after they said Ms. Lewinsky had claimed to have a sexual relationship with a "high-ranking White House official." Bleiler and Ms. Lewinsky have acknowledged a five-year sexual relationship.

It is not clear when Ms. Lewinsky will testify. Speights and her lead attorney, William Ginsburg, have asked a court to give her immunity from prosecution in exchange for her testimony, arguing they had a deal to do so with prosecutors. Starr has said such a deal was never finalized.

Barbara Nicastro, a private attorney and former Justice Department prosecutor, also emphasized the importance of corroborating information Ms. Lewinsky might have revealed before the alleged relationship became public.

"If she talks to them regularly it's a girl thing, but people you know from way back are people you talk with about the darkest parts of your life," Ms. Nicastro said. "What she said in unguarded moments will damage or bolster" any comments she makes now.

Open Competition for Public Art

The Murray D. Lincoln Campus Center in association with the Campus Center/Student Union Commission is pleased to announce important art competitions being conducted with the purpose of acquiring four mural paintings to compliment the collection of historical murals displayed on the walls of the concourse areas of the Campus Center. These competitions are open to all Umass Amherst students, alumnae, faculty, and staff as well as artists residing in the Amherst vicinity. Materials for the murals will be provided by the Campus Center, and the artists will be awarded stipends as noted below.

SITES AND THEMES

These representational murals will be painted on furniture grade plywood to the dimensions specified for each site. Because we seek a specific type of representational mural, the following site requirements should be considered definitive statements of our expectations. Simplicity is preferred to extreme complexity. Stylistic suggestion may be inferred from the works of notables such as Edward Hopper, Thomas Hart Benton, Diego Riviera. The artists will use paint (acrylic or oil) and drawing. Photographic image transfer processes are not eligible.

Site I: Two panels measuring 4'x8' will be installed to the left and right of the Phyllis Gardner Mural, "The Rope Pull." Accordingly these new panels should compliment the Gardner work in style of painting and by making some reference to the campus pond and/or some activity associated over time with that area. The depiction may be contemporaneous to "The Rope Pull" or consider some other period. The strength of the Gardner work should be respected. The two new works are to be adjuncts. Stipend: $1500

Site II: One panel measuring 4'x16' will be installed on the south wall of the lower concourse adjacent to the Collegian, and WMUA complex. Accordingly the mural should address the historical place of student media in the life of the Campus. Stipend: $1000

Site III: A panel measuring 4'x16' will be installed on the North Wall of the Lower Concourse adjacent to the Auditoria Entrance. The theme here should consider the contributions to the cultural life of the University made by the lecture and distinguished lecturer(s). Stipend: $1000

SELECTION AND JURY CALENDAR

All entries shall be received by April 30, 1998. Entries shall be in the form of prototype paintings to a specified scale at 24" wide. A statement of purpose describing what is being presented, how it would be executed and a rational of suitability for the proposed location should be included. An estimate of materials cost should be included. Also, a brief vitae indicating any previous mural painting experience should accompany the entry.

A jury from the Campus Center/Student Union Commision, the Campus Center Administraton and the University of Massachusetts Art Dept., will review entries and announce selections by May 15, 1998. Work will be completed prior to a final acceptance review by the jury. Final review will be conducted on or about Sept. 1, 1998. The acceptance procedure will be in accordance with the terms of the written agreement to be signed by the artist and the Campus Center Administration.

Proposals are due at the Textbook Annex by April 30, 1998. A second preliminary rendering may be required of accepted porposers. Questions may be directed to the competition coordinator: Thad Dabrowski, Assistant Manager, Textbook Annex, University of Massachusetts, Amherst, Ma 01003. Telephone: (413) 545-3570 • email: T_Dabrowski@auxcom.aux.umass.edu

All items submitted must indicate the name, address, and phone number of the entrant or contact person. All entries become property of the Campus Center.

The end?

The latest allegations broadcast against President Clinton have followed a familiar pattern of sensation, denial, counter-attack and opinion poll analysis. Those surveys suggest that Americans are inclined to think that President Clinton has been involved in sexual misconduct but are reluctant to press matters further. A solid 63 percent approve of the President's performance in office despite the fact that an even stronger proportion — 66 percent — believe that Clinton lacks high personal and ethical standards. Kathleen Willey's televised interview on "60 Minutes," much like the Monica Lewinsky allegations, does not seem to have altered matters much. It is little wonder that most observers still assume that Clinton will survive.

Marty Keane

It is not the task of Kenneth Starr, the independent counsel, to be swayed by such numbers. The current wave of depositions and subpoenas is likely to represent the last stage of his investigation. Once he has presented the remaining relevant characters — not the least of which is President Clinton himself — before his Grand Jury, he will probably seek to wrap up his evidence. This may mean that he then invites Congress to consider possible impeachment.

The Constitution places responsibility for this process primarily in the House of Representatives. It will thus be Speaker Newt Gingrich who determines the Republican response. Gingrich has shown little enthusiasm for pursuing the President. His caution is only partly shaped by Clinton's popularity. Clearly, the White House is coasting on the strength of the American economy. Clinton's standing is hardly secure when it is so closely linked to an economic boom that will inevitably slow at some point, almost certainly sooner rather than later. Indeed, many Wall Street insiders are now coming down off their rosy predictions for 10 percent growth rates in the second quarter due to the financial chaos in Asia. Only time is able to tell for certain how Clinton will weather this storm. However, Gingrich knows that impeachment may damage Congress as well as the President and is mindful of this fact. It is also not in his interests to elevate Al Gore into the Oval Office.

Starr's detailed examination of the Whitewater affair may ultimately mean little more than a $40 million bill to American taxpayers. Whatever he has discovered, the Democrats will argue that the incidents concerned have long since passed. They will say further that such issues are inevitably complex and that the Clintons may have unknowingly and unwittingly broke the law. The President's associates will note that Clinton is not the only politician in Washington whose finances require some explanation. It will be asserted that Clinton is entitled to the presumption of innocence. That should mean a trial after he has left office, not ejection from it. In the interim, the President should be allowed to continue unhindered. Of course, all this rhetoric has little (if any) legal weight, but it may prove to be politically persuasive, especially considering Clinton's communicative abilities and the recent successful media campaigns run by his team of political spin-doctors.

One factor, though, could upset all these calculations. The sexual harassment lawsuit brought by Paula Jones against the President had been considered an embarrassing distraction but not a potential political powderkeg. A conviction was thought highly improbable in the absence of witnesses. The emergence of Willey may well alter that assumption. An adverse verdict would imply the President was a sexual predator who systematically lied under oath and intimidated witnesses to protect himself. Mr. Gingrich could then hardly resist conservative demands for impeachment and liberal Democrats would swiftly abandon Clinton. The White House will do its utmost to discredit Willey's testimony. In the end though, she, not Starr, may be the real threat to the President.

Reality check

The war is over. Somebody scratched and clawed slightly more than their respective counterparts and now has earned the right to be the Student Government Association's (SGA) president or trustee. In this prestigious position, person x (it really doesn't matter who) will proceed to take over the job requirements which add up to more scratching and clawing, arguing about pointless subjects, and grooming him or herself into being a future senator or congressperson about whom we will all complain about in due time.

Seth Koenig

All the candidates promised pretty much the same things. Ideally, ATM's will be appearing in each of the residential areas, TIBO will be appearing on our televisions, RSOs will be appearing in bigger rooms, unlocked doors will be appearing on the day, discounts will be appearing on our tuition bills, good tasting food will be appearing on our trays, and beer will not be disappearing from the hands of our 21 year old students. Isn't all this wonderful? This impressive platform supported just about every person you could have voted for on Monday and Tuesday, March 10th and 11th.

Unfortunately, these promises will fall by the wayside, just as past attempts to grant such things to the student population have been futile.

The SGA has more power than any other RSO on campus. They have more money, they have more legal say in matters dealing with Whitmore, they have more press coverage (at least when juicy stuff is going on), and they have more influence in other, puny RSOs (because they control the purse strings, for the most part). I believe that this would be a grand way to get a lot of good accomplished on campus. This power can be put to use to make the UMass experience a great one, for those involved in the SGA and those who don't even realize it exists.

And sometimes it is. Not terribly often, though.

The power that the SGA has is rarely used in a negative way, however, it's all too often left unused instead of being put to the task of creating a more perfect campus.

One would think if all the candidates believed in the same platform and wanted the same things, regardless of who was actually voted into office, the people in the SGA would be able to accomplish a pantload of those things. If you have a bunch of people who all theoretically agree on what should happen to make the Amherst campus a better place, they should have no problem cutting straight to the point and getting important legislation passed and cash allotted and whatnot.

All I know is that the very aspects of the national political scene that we all claim to abhor are alive and well and are growing up as young politicians here at the University of Massachusetts.

Instead, the Newt Gingrich and Bill Clinton masks come on and they argue, and they undermine each other, and they backstab, and, well, they basically do what most politicians do: an ugly remake of last week's "Young and the Restless."

All I know is that the very aspects of the national political scene that we all claim to abhor are alive and well and are growing up as young politicians here at the University of Massachusetts.

Don't we all groan when the presidential election rolls around and we're stuck picking the candidate who flung the most mud? Don't we all sigh when two fifty or sixty year old tightwads go back and forth about subjects none of us understands nor cares about? At the college level we have a chance to break that mold. Here, the candidates aren't fueled by lobbyist groups who pay for the platform. Here, we have a chance to deal with the issues at face value and move the process along at an honest rate. We have the option to create a generation of politicians who care about the population and debate about the actual problems that face our society. If we start at the University level, honesty and work ethic, just maybe, will begin to infect our nation's government, as the young people here pursue their dreams to that elite level.

Instead, we listen to stories about how to and so put up an "illegal" poster, and so and so's evil henchmen tore down campaign signs, and so and so took wrongful advertising funding, and so and so's dog took a leak on so and so's flower bed, and on and on and on. Maybe I'm alone, but I don't care. I want to know who among them is going to make my life slightly more pleasant in some minuscule way by using the office of president or trustee for the powers of good.

I'm sorry, but I can turn on C-SPAN if I want to see immature bickering and finger pointing clouding the minds of a government. I expect more from our leaders of tomorrow.

Choose a life — any life

I spend a lot of time staring at the posters in my room whenever my mind drifts off whatever I'm supposed to be doing. I have the Trainspotting poster that comes already hung on every dorm room wall for an additional cost of $20. It's the orange, black, and white one with all the writing and profanity that I hope my roommates' parents never noticed while I tried to distract them with mindless chatter about the black market trade in porcelain Chihuahuas.

Alexis Pushkear

I know it's a piece of paper, but when I look at it I see an old man raving at me: "Choose life. Choose a job. Choose a career..." I get stressed just thinking about it, and I usually end up smashing the porcelain Chihuahuas.

I can't choose what I want from the dinner menu at a restaurant. I tell myself that it really doesn't matter whether I have a tofu burger with guacamole or Gorgonzola ravioli tossed with infused oils and sun-dried tomatoes. The choice isn't earth-shattering, so why should I agonize over it?

I know I have problems when I get to the big stuff, though: choosing classes, choosing a major, choosing a job, choosing a lifestyle. I've always been told that I could be anything that I wanted. Now I'm almost 20 years old and making all these life-changing decisions, and I can't decide which path to take. Even flipping hamburgers at McDonald's sounds appealing about thirty seconds into a chemistry homework set.

The worst part about not knowing anything about my future is not the uncertainty itself but being asked about it. Family gatherings are no better after the awkward adolescent phase. Once one becomes an adult, I find that one needs a goal and a direction in order to be socially acceptable. No one really cares what I'm doing as long as it's honest and "whatever makes me happy."

Again, no help there. I might derive some small measure of happiness from beating yaks with bikinis, but I can't make an acceptable career out of that. And at this point, I'd aim for an "acceptable" career, never mind a really great career.

The worst part about not knowing anything about my future is not the uncertainty itself but being asked about it.

Everyone assures me I don't need to have life figured out at 20, and I'm fine with "still having plenty of time yet" before I really embark on my life. But everyone asks me what interests me all the time, and I can't tell them. "Everything and nothing." Then they say, "Oh, you must have some interest," as though the fact that I can't make up my mind is out of the realm of possibility. "Well, I'm thinking of joining the Peace Corps and becoming the next ambassador to Yemen." I lie. And of course they say, "Let me tell you about someone I know who did that." An hour later I make my escape by throwing a porcelain Chihuahua out the window and yelling, "Stop, thief!"

I can tell people what I'm not interested in. For example, I never understood philosophy because I never really figured out whether that donkey had free will or whether fate determined whether he took the left path or the right path. Humans would like to believe that they have free will, but who's to say that everyone is not fate's puppet?

Of course it's easy for me to believe in fate because it absolves me of all responsibility. Living with the outcomes of choices made can be hard when the choices seemed right at the time, but the place where the choices led is completely wrong. I feel as though the time is flying by in college, and I have a funny feeling that I'm going to graduate and realize that I should have been studying something else entirely. I'm not sure that going off to college right after high school is the best thing, because in high school many choices are made for you and in college you need to decide what you want. How can you know unless you've lived a little first?

Trainspotting the movie was all about choosing life over heroin. I think I'm set with that choice, it's just the rest that confuses me. My new plan is to ignore my poster and put off choosing anything for as long as possible. If anyone asks, I'm going to make a career out of painting porcelain Chihuahuas.

Letters to the Editor

Restart the Peace Process

To the editor:

Certainly, one of the lingering consequences of our recent experience with Iraq is that the "double standard" with which the United States deals with Israel and the Arab world has re-emerged as an all too real doctrine and one that has driven even pro-U.S. Arab Governments into a state of protracted estrangement from us.

In light of the recent avoidance of hostilities, thanks to a U.N. brokered accord with Iraq on weapon's inspections, many, including Americans, have called on the Clinton Administration to jump-start the dangerously stagnated peace process between Israel and the Palestinians. These "experts" warn that the United States runs the risk of further alienating the Arab world, witnessing the United States' acquiescence to the Israelis' backing out of the peace process.

It was not too long ago that two historic, sworn enemies, Arafat and Rabin, arduously hammered out the Oslo Accords that were formally signed in Washington, signalling the beginning of the withdrawal of Israeli troops from the Gaza Strip and West Bank, coupled with the Palestinians' recognition of the State of Israel and its legitimate security interests.

There was a freeze on settlements and the impossible — peace between Arab and Jew — seemed now arguably very real and within reach.

But what has happened since Rabin's assignation and the election of Benjamin Netanyahu has spelled disaster for the peace process.

Netanyahu has quietly stonewalled and backed out of the mandated withdrawal of Israeli Security Forces from occupied lands. He and his government have allowed talks to repeatedly break down. This has happened with little exhibited distress in Washington.

And to make matters worse, the Israeli government has again restarted the construction of Jewish homes in areas that were to be administered by the Palestinians. And the White House watches with nary a word.

We, as Americans, if we are interested in a lasting peace, should urge the White House and the Secretary of State to reconvene the Israeli and Palestinian leaders and formally restart the peace talks. If they don't, then the Arab talk of a "double standard" will ring true.

I, for one, would like to believe Clinton's presence in the Rose Garden between Rabin and Arafat was more than just a photo-op.

Transcendent foray of truth

Along with her new look, Madonna's album Ray of Light shines.

RAY OF LIGHT
Madonna
Maverick/Warner Bros.

With Madonna, there are no rules to follow.

But those looking for a trace of the Material Girl's previous styles in her new album, Ray of Light, will be sorely disappointed. Gone are the insipid lyrics, the catchy beats and thin vocals that characterized Madonna's earlier efforts. Instead, Ray of Light is a transcendent foray into electronic music, with fleshed out vocals — thanks to extensive training during Evita — and reflective lyrics.

The change that comes with Ray of Light — a softer, more pensive sound — should not surprise any Madonna fan; Madonna is known for her innovation and creativity, whether it be for wearing her underwear outside of her clothes or for publishing a book of sexually explicit pictures. But this time, along with the change in image comes a change in her music.

Madonna began moving away from her Erotica phase with the hip but still provocative Bedtime Stories and then followed that up with the more elegant Evita. It was in Evita that Madonna's singing talent began to emerge. While she will never be considered a great vocalist, the training she took while working on the musi-

Below the surface of the President

PRIMARY COLORS
Directed by Mike Nichols with John Travolta, Emma Thompson, Adrian Lester
Playing at Hampshire Six Theaters

I was a junior in high school when President Bill Clinton, on a Thursday in October, visited our gymnasium and signed an education bill promising more class time and better opportunities. Of course, the bill didn't matter much to us — here was an unforgettable, frenzied event, a chance to see the most important figure in America sit 50 feet away from you. Some of us just wanted to be on T.V. Some wanted to see what the President was like in person. One guy who had a first-hand look was our student government president, who sat right next to Clinton and introduced him. Our nervous student representative gave probably the shortest introductory speech in history. Clinton didn't miss a beat. I can't remember the exact words, but he said something like, "Jeremy, if you keep making speeches that short you'll definitely be a successful politician."

But we never saw how Clinton talked to his wife the night before, we never knew how his aides felt when they were forced to cover up one of his many scandals. We just saw the surface Primary Colors, the super-intelligent and involving new film from director Mike Nichols, asks the question — is the surface enough?

In today's world, suggests Nichols, the answer is yes. Clinton is accused of having affairs with numerous women, but yet his approval ratings go up. A man watching T.V. in Primary Colors comments that the newest woman isn't that bad looking. We're all a little cutthroat, as the characters in the film come to realize. But by the end, they also know that a man who cannot change himself can still change other people.

Based on the novel by Newsweek's Joe Klein, the movie takes us way back to the campaign for the Democratic nomination, and puts it in the hands of Henry Burton, a young idealist played with solid dignity by newcomer Adrian Lester. One day Burton finds himself on a plane to New Hampshire, swept up in the campaign. The Governor — here called Jack Stanton — sleeps on his shoulder. He's skeptical at first but then becomes overpowered by Stanton's ambition.

It's so crucial that the star of the movie is Lester and not John Travolta as our rambunctious, chicken-wing eating presidential candidate. Despite how good Travolta's character is, it's more effective to see him on the sidelines — we get enough Bill already in the news. Meanwhile, through Burton we see mainly what he sees, and feel his disappointment and frustration in what politics is all about. Stanton, for all his talent and charisma, has affairs with teachers and a daughter of his favorite fast-food chef.

But as much as Primary Colors is cynical, it is sympathetic. Our first glimpse of the Governor is at a school library where he uncannily relates to poor, illiterate folk determined to learn how to read. Later, Burton finds him in a doughnut shop, talking with the owner — no cameras, no media. The Governor is corrupt, yes, but he knows people. he knows how they feel, and he cares.

Unfortunately, he hurts many in the process. One of these is his wife Hillary, or Susan as she's named here. The film depicts the delicate balance Susan goes through between her devotion to the campaign and her personal needs. When her husband cheats on her, Susan can only cringe and turn away. As portrayed with incredible intelligence and toughness by the brilliant Emma Thompson, Susan also has some funny, biting moments: she throws her keys at Jack's head and her first words describing him are "faithless, thoughtless, disorganized, undisciplined."

Stealing the show is Kathy Bates, as an aging moral "dust- buster." She enters the campaign thinking Jack and politics have changed, but they haven't. There's a scene with Bates late in the movie, when she confronts the Stanton's with evidence against their opponent's character, that captures the heart of the film — and perhaps the feeling of many Americans — so well. It's a moving moment and one that ensures Bates a supporting actress nomination next year.

Our guide through all of this is director Nichols, no stranger to controversial subjects as the filmmaker behind The Graduate, made a couple decades ago but still a timeless classic of American cinema. Primary Colors is neither as good nor as timeless, but the similarities between the two films are abundant. Both deal heavily with sex — not the act itself, but the motivations behind it and its repercussions.

Nichols relieves the seriousness of the campaign trail with some great comedic moments. He sends his characters searching frantically for cell phones in the woods and, late at night, has them singing about their mothers. Billy Bob Thornton, cleverly playing a role fashioned after political strategist James Carville, is deliciously sarcastic and matter- of-fact, especially when trying to explain metaphors about boars and britches. Don't ask.

Along with the equally effective Wag the Dog, we now have two films about presidential escapades and the inner- workings of politics. Primary Colors is sometimes overkill, and occasionally flat, but also too smart to fall into traps. It's the kind of movie that changes your state of mind after leaving the theater, and the type of film that, believe it or not, actually makes you think about who you vote for in the next election. That's accomplishment enough. A-

Old tap with an industrial twist

The hit Aussie production Tap Dogs will perform tonight and tomorrow night at the Fine Arts Center's Concert Hall.

Tap Dogs, the irreverent, rocking theatrical experience from Australia that has changed the face of tap forever, will perform at the Fine Arts Center Concert Hall tonight and tomorrow at 8 p.m.

Tap Dogs is comprised of seven male dancers from Australia, who quickly have become an international award- winning sensation since their premiere in 1995. The world- wide demand for Tap Dogs, demonstrates their tremendous success. They have played sold-out engagements in over 100 cities around the world.

Providing audiences with a unique theatrical experience, Tap Dogs is a combination of theater and dance, rock concert and construction site. Tap Dogs grew out of choreographer Dein Perry's experience as an industrial mechanic in Newcastle, Australia, as well as out of his collaboration with designer Nigel Triffitt and composer Andrew Wilkie. Tap Dogs perform in jeans and Blundstones, the Tasmanian made-work boots, while constructing intricate rhythms on an ingenious steel–and–wood construction–site set. Tap Dogs features Sheldon Perry, Lathanieal Cooper, Christopher Erk, Jeremy Fullam, James Guasto, Jeremy Kiesman, and Anthony Lucuscio.

Tap dogs was an immediate hit at the Sydney Theatre Festival, where it had its world premiere. Later that year, the praise continued at the Edinburgh Festival. After their initial entrance onto the dance scene, Tap Dogs also enjoyed continued success throughout Australia and Europe. Dein became the first person to win a second,

Will Susan Lucci be snubbed again ?

Hi soap fans. Did everyone have a lovely Spring Break? I'm sure those of you who spent the week in Daytona or worse yet, Cancun, have your fair share of stories that, perhaps, rival the soaps themselves (weekend romances etc...). As for moi, I spent the week in this frost pit we call Massachusetts, working no less. There was a silver lining though...at least I got to watch my beloved soaps.

This year's Daytime Emmy nominations were announced last Wednesday and, as usual, the question on everyone's mind was, "Will Ms. Lucci, diva extraordinaire, snag her billionth nod for Best Actress?" At this rate, she may get a lifetime achievement award before she finally wins that Emmy. Anyway, in case you missed them, here's a list of the nominees.

Best Drama:
- "All My Children"
- "Days of Our Lives"
- "General Hospital"
- "Young and the Restless"

Lead Actress:
- Eileen Davidson (Kristin/Susan, "Days")
- Cynthia Watros (Annie, "Guiding Light")
- Kim Zimmer (Reva, "GL")
- Jacklyn Zeman (Bobbie, "GH")
- And... Susan Lucci (Erica, "AMC")

Lead Actor:
- Peter Bergman (Jack, "Y&R")
- Eric Braeden (Victor, "Y&R")
- Anthony Geary (Luke, "GH")
- Kin Shriner (Scott, "Port Charles")
- David Canary (Adam/Stuart, "AMC")

Supporting Actor:
- Ian Buchanan (James, "Bold and the Beautiful") — he'll always be Duke ("GH") in my book
- Grant Alexsander (Phillip, "GL")
- Steve Burton (Jason, "GH")
- Michael E. Knight (Tad, "AMC")
- Scott Reeves (Ryan, "Y&R")

Supporting Actress:
- Vanessa Marcil (Brenda, "GH") — this one's for you, Beth
- Julia Barr (Brooke, "AMC")
- Amy Carlson (ex-Josie, "Another World")
- Victoria Rowell (Dru, "Y&R")
- Amy Ecklund (Abigail, "GL")

Younger Actor:
- Jensen Ackles (Eric, "Days")
- Jonathan Jackson (Lucky, "GH")
- Bryant Jones (Nate, "Y&R")
- Tyler Christopher (Nikolas, "GH")
- Kevin Mambo (Marcus, "GL")

Younger Actress:
- Sarah Brown (Carly, "GH")
- Camryn Grimes (Cassie, "Y&R")
- Christie Clark (Carrie, "Days")
- Heather Tom (Victoria, "Y&R")
- Rhonda Ross (Toni, "AW")

Overall, I'm quite happy about the nominations, especially Cynthia Watros and Eileen Davidson's nods for Best Actress, both of which were well deserved. Cynthia was "GL" last year... enough said. The real wild card in this race is Susan Lucci (if Eileen and Cynthia split the votes) who had an incredible year. The scenes involving Maddie were some of the most heart-wrenching work she's done in years (don't tell me you didn't shed a tear when she handed over Maddie to Maria). If anyone's earned an Emmy, it's this woman.

As expected, "Y&R" led the pack with a whopping 11 nominations, followed by "GH" and "AMC." There were, however, a few surprises one of which was Peter Bergman's (Jack, "Y&R") nod for Best Actor (not that he and Eric, aka Victor, don't get one every year). No offense to Mr. Bergman but there were a few other fine actors, on his show alone, who had a much more daunting acting task. I just didn't think the material was there for him this year. Another surprise was Jensen Ackles' (Eric, "Days") nomination for Younger Actor. He's been on the show for what... a week. There's a lesson to be learned here, whine and bitch and you're almost guaranteed a spot. Doesn't that sum up his first few months on the show? I mean, how many times have we heard him whine, "Mom, you can't do that to Dad!" It makes me want to slam my head into a wall.

I'm a little bummed about Nancy Lee Grahn, Stephen Nichols, Lisa Peluso and Roger Howarth's (Alexis and Stefan of "GH," Lila from "AW" and Todd on "One Life To Live") absence from the list of nominees. It's a sin I tell you. I'm thrilled about Tyler Christopher's (Nik, "GH") nomination. How could the Academy say no to a face like that (can I get an "amen," ladies... ha). Seriously though, he had a great year. It's rare to find such depth and maturity in a newcomer. The thing that really has me pissed off is "GL's" absence in the category of Best Drama. Hello Academy, have we been watching the same show? The other bit of be is "As The World Turn's" no-show. The show didn't get a single nomination. So what if the show stunk for the better half of last year, the actors certainly didn't.

On a more personal note, next Saturday I'll be attending a charity dinner for the "Make-A-Wish" foundation. There'll be quite a few of daytime's rising stars in attendance including Stephen Nichols (Stefan, "GH"), John Ingle and John J. York (Edward and Mac, "GH"), Michael Dietz and Jay Pickett (Joe and Frank, "PC") and two of daytime's hottest ladies, Lisa Peluso (Lila, "AW") and Laura Wright (Cassie, "GL"). The dinner includes an autograph signing and a chance to even... gasp, mingle with the stars themselves. I invite you all to come (and stop me from making a fool of myself). I'd love to see some familiar faces there. There is a bitch: the dinner costs $55 but $32 of it's tax-deductible (ka-ching) and better yet, it's for a good cause. God knows, we've spent more money on a measly shirt from Abercrombie and Fitch. Need some more convincing, the food is excellent and more importantly, free. If you're interested send me an e-mail or, better yet, call for your ticket directly. The number is 1-800-873-9474. Hope to see you there.

In a bit of soap news, rumor has it, the one and only, Deidre Hall (Marlena, "Days") may be on her way out of Salem. Time to crack open the champagne... no, no, just joking. Word is, she wants to spend more time with her family. How very daytime-ish.

Soaps to watch this week:

"General Hospital" — In celebration of the show's 35th anniversary (35 years of daytime at its best, give or take a year), Bob Guza's going all out. Look for Robin to take a turn for the worse. Will Jason save her in time? Lucky forms an unlikely alliance and we finally find out why Audrey has been wigging out over Liz's rape.

"Young and the Restless" — On last Friday's riveting cliff-hanger, Veronica shot both Nikki and Joshua after he spurned her advances (the woman's not dealing with a full deck). Both her and Laura from "Days" need to be committed). Will they live? Tune in to find out. You won't be disappointed.

An Open Letter to Students Planning to Attend Law School from U.S.News & World Report

Dear Student

DON'T YOU JUST HATE TO BE GRADED? Well, by their shrill protests about U.S.News & World Report law school rankings, so do most of the deans of the law schools you are considering. However, as a law school graduate with both a J.D. and a LL.M. degree, I can tell you that these same deans will subject you to rigorous grading. You will be required to endure lectures from tenured professors who have not changed their class notes since the Battle of Hastings. Then, after attending class for a full semester, you will be given one exam to determine your grade. One exam, one semester, one grade. One roll of the dice to measure your performance.

At U.S.News & World Report we are far more equitable (to use a legal term). We have a multi-faceted, multi-dimensional, sophisticated ranking system developed and evolved over many years to give you guidance on what may be one of your largest financial investments and certainly one of the most important choices for your career in law and perhaps beyond. While our law school rankings should not be the only criteria in your choice of a law school, they should certainly be an important part of the analysis.

Get your copy of U.S.News & World Report's Best Graduate Schools guide on newsstands now. Or, to make it easier for you to see the book that 164 law school deans would prefer you not see (notwithstanding their commitment to the First Amendment), call 1-800-836-6397 (ask for extension 5105) and I will arrange for a copy of the book to be sent directly to you at $1 off the newsstand price.* This will also ensure that you have a copy of these important rankings because, as a result of publicity surrounding the deans' determination to have you ignore the rankings, they are a very hot item.

These law school rankings are a small part of our philosophy of News You Can Use® information we bring you in each issue of the magazine to help you manage your life.

Good luck in law school and good luck on making the right choice.

Kindest Regards.

Sincerely,

Cannibus above MTV audience

What's up? I hope you enjoyed your spring breaks. If you weren't in the sun, and had a chance to watch MTV Spring break, I hope you had a chance to catch DJ Scribble's performance. The man got illmatic on a Run-DMC track to the point where he took his shirt off while spinning, it was pure hip hop at its best. It was also nice to see Cannibus get some exposure, as he made a guest appearance during Wyclef's set. Too bad Cannibus was clearly over the heads of the audience.

Adam Dlugacz

The single of the week, maybe month, either way it's what all aspiring DJs and hip hop head in general should own is "The Body Rock" featuring Mos Def, Q-Tip and Tesh of Alkaholik fame. This song might melt your turntable, as it is the first in Rawkus's Lyricists' Lounge. The nice people at Rawkus have also made this available on tape, so do yourself a favor and pick this up. Two other singles out on Rawkus right now are "Gruff Express" by McGruff and "What if?/Liquid" by J. Fudge.

Gang Starr's album is supposed to be out this week. "I Put in Work" and "You Know My Steez" have been on just about every mix tape and they are pure 100 percent whipped butter.

Prince Paul's Psychoanalysis, has been out on Tommy Boy records, and I just got to peep it. Paul still has the ability to find obscure beats that slam harder than Shawn Kemp. His lyrics on the other hand are out there on some ill vibe. While the lyrics are tongue in cheek, it makes you wonder what he's smoking. Still I hope one of the hardest working and least recognized names in hip hop finally gets the attention he deserves.

The X-Ecutioners, formally the X-Men, have released their full length X-Pressions on Asphodel records. The X-Ecutioners (they'll always be the X-Men to me, besides they could kill Superman without kryptonite, just a turntable), are made up of Mister Sinista, Rob Swift, Roc Raider and Total Eclipse. These are the only four DJs to battle the Invisible Scratch Pickles and walk away. This album is a full representation of what four DJs can do when they put their collective skill into creating a hip–hop masterpiece. These guys are the Michael Jordan's of hip–hop.

The fab–five of this years hip hop class. Every year the radios and turntables are littered with one–hit wonders who hit one over the fence and then hover around the Mendoza line for the rest of their lives. Recently, some real DJs have begun to emerge from the Puff–Daddy, two–cent movie fantasy inspired rappers who have put a stranglehold on the airwaves.

These are the five who have the best chance to leave a mark on the community.

- Cannibus or "Can I Bus," yes, anywhere you like. Bottom line is this guy doesn't even have a single out, but people are putting him amongst the all–time greatest microphone assassins already. He rips it on every track and it looks like he might end LL Cool J's career. Simply put everyone wants him on their tracks but no one wants to battle him. He's the Chris Webber of this team.
- Mos Def, first heard on De La Soul's Stakes Is High, his buttery flow has everyone's knees bending. His debut single "Universal Magnetic" is hot, bringing back memories of the first time you heard Q–Tip. While he's mostly been hyped for his delivery and ability to play with words, don't sleep on his skill or he'll hurt you.
- J–Live. Do yourself a favor and pick up "Braggin Writes" his single. He's painting pictures that only veterans and Picasso are supposed to paint. A poet and a lyricist.
- Kweli, peep him on Soundbombing with Mos Def. He throws deadly needles with his words but remains conscience about the community.
- DMX, I'm not sure about this dog. I sweat everything he's done so far but I can see him being the Jalen Rose of this team. A lot of talent, but doesn't produce like he should.

Peace.

cal is evident in Ray of Light.

For her first experiment in electronic music, Madonna teamed up with William Orbit, a producer known for his remix work for Seal and The Cure. The two had previously worked together on Madonna's controversial "Justify My Love" and the theme song from With Honors, "I Will Remember."

Along with the change in music genre, Ray of Light is more autobiographical and more feeling than other Madonna albums and in this sense, Ray of Light resembles Like a Prayer in its honesty.

The album opens with "Drowned World/Substitute For Love," a deeply felt ode to Madonna's need for fame and success in an effort to make up for the lack of love in her life.

"Ray of Light" literally explodes. The title track is wonderfully put together, infused with a lightness that is missing from both "Drowned World" and the second song, "Swim."

"Candy Perfume Girl" is a frivolous but metaphorical venture into passion and desire. If anything, "Candy Perfume Girl" comes across more Tori Amos–esque than any recording Madonna has put forth before.

"Shanti/Ashtangi" demonstrates the interest Madonna has developed in religion and yoga. The Sanskirt–based piece is influenced by Indian and Moroccan sounds and is accompanied by an infectious beat.

The trilogy of "Frozen," "The Power of Good–Bye" and "To Have And Not To Hold" are subdued compared to the first half of the CD but are more entrancing and profound. "Frozen," in its simplicity, sets the mood for the next two songs. The darkness of "Frozen" reflects a theme of opening up to feelings, but also shows off Madonna's newly found vocal talent. On "Frozen," more than any other song, Madonna's voice is fuller and more feeling, giving the theme more credibility.

"The Power of Good–Bye" begins with a line from "Frozen" — "Your heart's not open" — and then continues along the lines of the fear the comes when the actual words of good–bye are spoken. Once again, Madonna manages to put herself completely within the song, infusing the music with not only meaning but also a deeper emotion.

The Philosophical "To Have And Not To Hold" closes out the trilogy. "To Have And Not To Hold" has a sweeter tone than other songs on the album and once again showcases Madonna's voice rising clearly above the music, instead of being bogged down by the heavy electronic beats.

If there are disappointments on Ray of Light, it would be the final two tracks — "Little Star" and "Mer Girl." "Little Star," of course, is the lullaby dedicated to Madonna's daughter, Lourdes, but the saccharine nature of the song quickly grates on the nerves. "Mer Girl" is a dark look at death and how Madonna came to terms with the loss of her mother at an early age.

In all though, Madonna's journey through electronic music is more honest and profound than anything she has attempted before. Innovative as always, Madonna manages to put an ethereal quality within her music. Ray of Light is more about feelings and less about dance or love. Where others might have been afraid to open their hearts, Madonna decided to take the chance to be honest and the gamble has paid off. A

Tarkanian feels pain of player's mother's shock

By Steve Wilstein
Associated Press

Jerry Tarkanian called a player's mother after the latest arrests a week ago, and felt the shock and bewilderment and helplessness in her soft, sobbing voice.

Here was another kid Tarkanian had given a second, third and fourth chance, another of his reclamation projects gone bad, and now he had to tell the mother that her son, center Avondre Jones, had been arrested and kicked off the Fresno State team.

"She was all shook up, heartsick," Tarkanian said. "She still can't believe it. Avondre would have graduated. He made the honor roll last spring. He just screwed himself all up."

Even by Tarkanian's turbulent standards, the Fresno State team he brings into the NIT semifinals Tuesday night at Madison Square Garden has gone through a hellish season.

Assaults and arrests. Fists, guns and samurai swords. Booze, drugs and rehab. Six suspensions, one dismissal, and lingering suspicions of point-shaving.

"It's been the most difficult year, by far," Tarkanian said, weariness in his scratchy voice, rings around his raccoon eyes, lids droopy as ever as he boarded a jet for New York.

Tarkanian knew tough times at Long Beach State and UNLV, each placed on probation during his reign, and he survived a long legal joust with the NCAA. He also knew his share of triumph, capturing the Final Four at UNLV in 1990 and coming into this season with the best winning percentage among active coaches at 667-145.

But nothing in all his years — not even the infamous photos of former Rebel players in a hot tub with a convicted gambler that led to his exit from UNLV in 1991 — compared to this 21-11 season of utter chaos and surprising success.

"I don't plan on doing this very long," said the towel-chomping 67-year-old, who is in his third year at his alma mater (all with at least 20 wins and NIT berths) and has a contract through next season. "I would just like to turn this thing around. I thought we could have done it by now. I'm disappointed we didn't."

Tarkanian's recruiting style wherever he has coached has been to place talent ahead of character and brains, to take kids who have had problems with alcohol or drugs or the law and give them a way out through basketball. He'll take kids from obscure junior colleges, or transfers who were unhappy at major universities. Anyone who has the game.

Unlike coaches at schools such as Stanford and North Carolina, who are in the Final Four, Tarkanian hasn't been restricted to students who must have high Scholastic Aptitude Test (SAT) scores and good grades to be accepted. This shark is a bottom fisher. Sometimes his approach has worked, reshaping the lives of players like former UNLV star Larry Johnson or Fresno standout Kendrick Brooks. But too often players drift through his program with little education and no degree. And no matter how they turn out, his methods can be perilous for the schools involved. When comedians joke that Fresno State is California's newest penitentiary, the school has more than an image problem. Alumni scream — at least those opposed to winning at all costs — and good prospective students may stay away.

"There's no question there are some risks that are taken," said Fresno State president John Welty, who considered pulling the team out of the NIT after Jones' arrest with freshman recruit Kenny Brunner for investigation of assault and robbery with deadly weapons.

"In a perfect world, I would prefer we didn't have to deal with these things," Welty said. "But if there's proper review and good assessment made, it certainly can be very worthwhile. He's had a number of successes, and in my mind it's far better to have an individual who gets a good educational experience and becomes a productive person, as opposed to someone that continues to have difficulty and really becomes a burden on society."

It's a hit!

Majerus sends Final Four wishes to Van Horn

SALT LAKE CITY (AP) — For all the satisfaction in reaching the Final Four, Utah coach Rick Majerus feels a twinge of remorse at not being able to get there a year earlier.

The reason? Keith Van Horn, an ex-Ute now in the employ of the New Jersey Nets.

Van Horn, the No. 2 NBA draft pick last year and a candidate for Rookie of the Year, called Majerus on Saturday as the team was leaving the hotel in Anaheim, Calif.

"He wished the team luck," Majerus said, his voice cracking. "I just wish I could have gotten him here."

The destination, of course, is the Final Four, where the Utes, following a stunning 76-51 upset of Arizona, will play North Carolina on Saturday.

Utah closed its practice at the Huntsman Center yesterday. The Utes (29-3) leave Wednesday for San Antonio, carrying hopes for the school's first NCAA championship in 54 years.

Van Horn and Majerus are close, their relationship strengthened by more than basketball.

Van Horn was the Western Athletic Conference Freshman of the Year in 1993-94, a season in which his father died from a heart attack. Majerus, who had heart-bypass surgery his first year at Utah, reached out to his grieving star.

"I remember when his dad died," Majerus said. "I guess you could say I became an interloper in the parental process." Majerus pushed Van Horn to do his school work and helped with his family. He yelled at him on the court, but off the court was a source of counsel.

Majerus stood behind Van Horn, beaming, when he donned a Nets cap and traded in his beat-up pickup truck for the new Lexus and a $9 million contract.

"I just wanted to let those guys know I was behind them," Van Horn told The Salt Lake Tribune on Sunday, just before the New Jersey-Washington game. "I wanted to offer my congratulations for a great season."

Van Horn was touched when he heard about Majerus's comment. "That means a lot to me," he said. "Our teams, we were capable of going. We played hard every night. It just didn't work out for us."

Four Cuban baseball stars fight for their rights

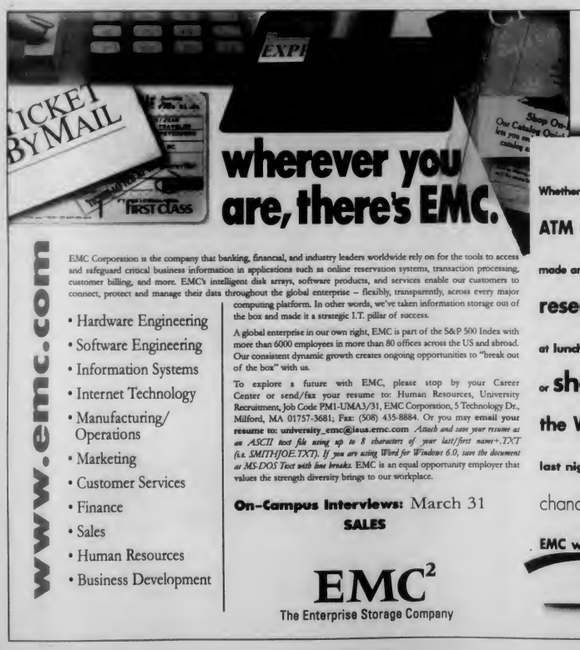
By Jessica Robertson
Associated Press

NASSAU, Bahamas — Begging for the right to live freely and condemning "unjust detention" in the Bahamas, four Cuban baseball stars and five friends appealed yesterday for asylum in Costa Rica. Bahamian defense forces, meanwhile, rescued another 10 Cuban boat people and were taking them to the detention center, where dozens of refugees protested the special treatment given to the Cuban players.

Some detainees who spoke to reporters through a chain-link fence said several Cubans had started a hunger strike yesterday. The camp's director, Arthur Rolle, denied that. But he did say security had been increased at the camp, where there have been riots.

Many detainees were barefoot, standing in mud puddles that formed after an all-night rainstorm.

One of the players, 23-year-old Jorge Luis Toca, told The Nassau Tribune yesterday that they had spent the night on the floor because there were no beds.



"We beseech your cooperation and help in permitting us the right to live in a country of total freedom where human rights are respected, the players said in a letter sent Monday to Costa Rican President Jose Maria Figueres. They asked him to immediately grant them "humanitarian visas."

The letter said they were being "unjustly detained" in the Bahamas, which regularly sends Cuban refugees back home. The letter was given to a reporter by Cuban-American sports agent Joe Cubas, who has instigated an international effort to release the players. "Our fear is that we will be deported back to Cuba where we know that, simply for being baseball players who have decided to abandon the country, we can expect grave consequences," the letter said.

The players left their hometowns in central Cuba on March 10, then hid for 10 days before setting out to sea Friday. They drifted into a Bahamian fishing boat a few hours later and were turned over to Bahamian authorities at Ragged Island, a tiny fishing outpost about 80 miles north of the Cuban coast.

The players included Angel Lopez, 25; Jorge Diaz, 23; and Michael Iova, a 17-year-old player from Cuba's junior Olympic team. They and Enrique Chinea, 41, a pitching coach, were banned from Cuban baseball last year because authorities suspected they were planning to defect.

Bahamian officials were unlikely to deport the celebrities, despite an agreement with the Cuban government to return all refugees.

Women's gymnastics bitten by Michigan's Wolverines

By Brett Mauser
Collegian Staff

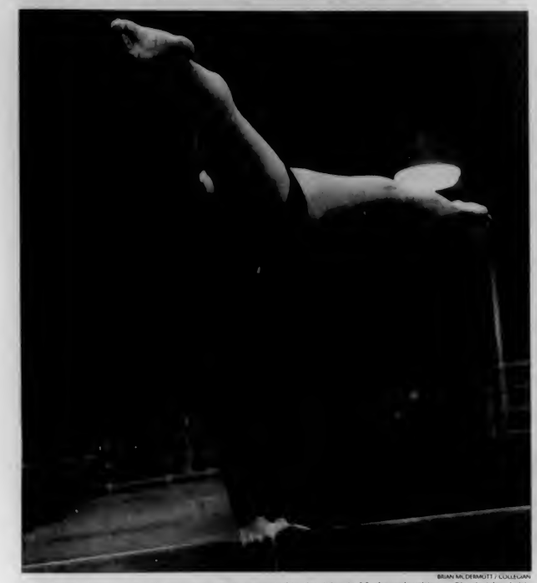
When looking at the sport of gymnastics, competition consists of individuals battling other individuals, but not against each other. At no point are two opposing competitors battling each other directly. There are no punches thrown or any game-winning goals. The Massachusetts women's gymnastics team learned that, despite these facts, gymnastics remains a team sport.

Consistency became a problem for the Minutewomen over break, as they took second place in both the regular season finale with No. 2 Michigan and the Atlantic 10 Championships.

In their meeting with the Wolverines, Michigan put together an impeccable performance, defeating UMass 197.550–192.825. The Wolverines overwhelmed the Minutewomen, sweeping the top three places in three individual events and the all-around. Freshman Jill Fisher's second place finish on the floor exercise saved the Minutewomen from a clean sweep.

Computing the numbers, the Maize and Blue averaged nearly a 9.90 on each performance, with three different gymnasts landing first place finishes. Fisher's 9.950 on the floor was the only score to eclipse that mark. Michigan posted a team score no lower than a 49.250, nearly three tenths higher than the Minutewomen's best score.

Junior Anita Sanyal had two strong performances, tying for fourth on beam with a 9.825 and posting a 9.800 on floor. Sophomore Mandy Mosby placed sixth on beam with a 9.800 and seventh on floor with a 9.825.



By looking at the stat sheet from the Atlantic Ten Championships, UMass looked like they would be well on their way to their third consecutive conference crown. A first place finish on every event, including three by Fisher, was not enough to propel the Minutewomen to victory.

Two tenths of a point separated the Minutewomen and the eventual winners, George Washington. After notching a 48.925 on the vault, good for first, UMass fell to third behind the Colonials and Rhode Island after subpar uneven bars and balance beam rotations.

The stage was set for another astounding set of floor routines. A school record 49.250 on the event leapfrogged the Rams in the standings, but fell just short of George Washington.

Sophomore Mandy Mosby was named the Most Outstanding Gymnast of the Championships, winning the all-around with a 38.950. She tied for first with teammates Fisher and freshman Mary Moore on the balance beam. Junior Jennifer Pokrana won the uneven bars battle with a 9.850.

The story, though, was Fisher. She continued her dominance on the floor routine, posting a 9.975. In addition, she tied for first on the vault with a 9.875 and won the balance beam event outright, registering a 9.850. She did not compete on the uneven bars.

Welsch attempts Boston Marathon as amputee runner

By Alison Fitzgerald
Associated Press

BOSTON — Mike Welsch can run the Boston Marathon, and he can do it on one leg.

Race officials originally said the amputee runner, who ran the marathon in eight hours last year, was about three hours too slow to qualify for the prestigious race.

Now they've decided Welsch's determination is enough, and have decided to make accommodations for him to take his place among the elite and everyday marathoners on the 26.2 mile run from Hopkinton to Boston.

"I am psyched and I will be there," he said after hearing the Boston Athletic Association had decided to let him run. "I just hope they don't change their mind or anything."

Welsch, 38, had run the Boston Marathon twice before and in December, he began training again for this year's race.

But was stunned last week when he got a letter from the BAA saying he couldn't participate.

"He was not given an official number because he in no manner of speaking was qualified and this is a qualifying race," Race Director Guy Morse said yesterday. "I've taken another look at Michael's special situation and we are going to allow him to enter."

Morse said the BAA would arrange to have Welsch start the race about two hours before the other runners, and arrange for security and medical support along the course for him.

"I think we can stretch our safety net with the cooperation of the cities and towns," he said.

In 1979, Welsch lost his left leg in an alcohol-related motorcycle accident that left his "good" leg in casts for nearly six years.

Even while his right foot was still encased in plaster, he put on his prosthesis and began riding a bicycle. Soon he was swimming and biking seriously and in 1986 Welsch decided to try a triathlon. Three years ago he set his sights on the Boston Marathon — the race's 100th anniversary.

"The first marathon was awesome," he said.

Before he began running, Welsch admits he had doubts he'd finish.

"A week before it we drove it. I almost literally got sick," he said. "I got so depressed I couldn't believe how long it was." But he said he talked himself through it, reminding himself he had run 18 miles before and once run 10 miles twice in a day. "I said to myself, now it's time to put it all together. You put all that in the bank and it's time to draw interest," he said. Welsch said he made it through the race by giving himself small goals to reach — 6 miles, 10 miles, then 13. He was halfway through and started counting down again.

"When I saw the Citgo sign it was just a spot down the road and it kept getting bigger and bigger and bigger," he said. "Once you get to the Citgo sign you know you did it."

winning sudden-death overtime goal against Harvard to record a hat trick on the following day.

Overall, the Minutewomen spread the offensive duties, with nine different players contributing with either an assist or a goal in the first two games, regardless of the intimidating chill factor.

"The beauty of our Harvard game was that a lot of kids had a couple goals," McClellan said. "I think that one of our strengths is how balanced our scoring is going to be this year."

As the UMass offense scattered the scoring threat over their whole lineup, their defense limited the opposition to relying on a single player. Seven of Harvard's scores came at the hands of Alli Harper, and all but one of Holy Cross' goals were attributed to Jen Amendola. Without sufficient support allowed by the Minutewomen defense, the two opposing stars were not able to stage respective victories alone.

The weather? Although the first two games were not pleasant for the fans, it seemed to affect the players little.

"We've been practicing in it for a long time. I don't think that it bothered us much," McClellan said.

A week later, on Saturday, March 21st, the New England skies tried again to throw a monkey wrench into the early season plans of the Minutewomen, as their game scheduled against the University of New Hampshire was postponed twice, before finally being rescheduled tentatively at the end of April. This development strips UMass of a vital tune-up game leading into a tough three game stretch against Brown, Yale, and Temple that begins tomorrow.

"I'm sorry we didn't get in our New Hampshire game," McClellan said. "We probably could've used another game before this week of big games [that are] coming up. The beauty is that we're well rested, though."

UM softball returns on high note from Florida road trip

By Jackie Leroux
Collegian Staff

Things are beginning to look up for the Massachusetts women's softball team.

The Minutewomen spent their spring break in sunny Florida, and were able to improve on more than just their tans. After starting the season in sluggish fashion, going 2–8, they went 9–3 in Florida, and ended the trip with their overall record on the winning end, at 11–10.

UMass began their trip at the Tallahassee Democrat Florida State Invitational. The Minutewomen advanced to the championship game of the tournament for the first time in school history. They lost 1–0 against No. 17 Florida State, finishing as the tournament's runner-up.

The Lady Seminoles scored the only run of the game in the third inning. UMass committed several errors on a grounder from Florida State's Jennifer White, allowing Dana Bailey to score. Minutewomen Kim Gutridge, who had a solid all-around performance in the tournament, was 3–3 from the plate in the Florida State tussle.

The unearned run from the Lady Seminoles was the only one given up by junior pitcher Danielle Henderson, who pitched in all six tournament games. The run snapped her consecutive shutout inning streak at 44.2 innings.

Henderson finished with a 5–1 record in the tournament, all five wins coming off of shutouts. In 41 innings she struck out 73 batters, and allowed just 13 walks.

On the first day of the tournament UMass defeated Furman 6–0, fell to Northern Illinois 4–1, and defeated Florida Atlantic 4–0. In the Furman game, Henderson struck out a total of twelve batters. With her sixth strikeout of the game she upped her career total to 494, surpassing Kelly Daut's previous school record.

Senior pitcher Liz Wagner started the Northern Illinois game, allowing four runs (two earned) on six hits. She walked one and fanned one.

Henderson had 13 strikeouts in the win over Florida Atlantic. During the game she became the first UMass pitcher to pass the 300 career strikeout plateau. For her outstanding play in the Invitational she was named the National Fast Pitch Coaches Association National Player of the Week, the first time she has ever received the honor. She was also named the WHMP/UMass Athlete of the week.

In the rest of the Invitational, UMass thrashed Bradley 8–0 and Minutewomen Kim Gutridge, who had a solid all-around performance in the tournament, was 3–3 from the plate in the Florida State tussle.

The unearned run from the Lady Seminoles was the only one given up by junior pitcher Danielle Henderson, who pitched in all six tournament games. The run snapped her consecutive shutout inning streak at 44.2 innings.

Henderson finished with a 5–1 record in the tournament, all five wins coming off of shutouts. In 41 innings she struck out 73 batters, and allowed just 13 walks.

UMass defeated LSU in the quarterfinals, then went on to defeat Michigan State, last year's tournament champion, in the semifinals.

In other games over the break, the Minutewomen played Bradley again in a doubleheader on March 16. They won both games, 6–0, and 3–2. The Minutewomen also defeated Florida A&M the next day by a score of 4–0.

Women's lacrosse on a roll

By Jamie Jee
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts women's lacrosse team opened up their season shortly after most students had left for spring break, and came away with wins against Harvard and Holy Cross on back to back game days.

UMass (2-0) started out against rival Harvard on Sunday after the snow on Saturday bumped up the contest to give the team games on consecutive days. Steeped in tradition whenever the teams have joined up in the past, they have usually provided an exciting game. They did not fail to disappoint in this outing, with the Minutewomen edging out the Crimson in double overtime, 13-12.

Freshman attacker Fay Naber led the way for UMass, scoring four goals in her collegiate debut. It was senior attacker Jen Bowen, however, that provided the winning goal, as she fired a shot past Harvard goalie Kelli Donelan with 1:21 remaining in the second overtime.

The Minutewomen came out fired up and junior attacker Laura Korutz opened the scoring with an unassisted goal not long into the game. Harvard bounced back, however, and eventually built a 5-2 lead before Naber scored two goals in the last five minutes of the half to move UMass to within one goal of the Crimson at 5-4.

The Minutewomen then regrouped at the break and again came out strong with Korutz and Naber notching two scores a piece push their team ahead at 8-5. UMass still had trouble containing Harvard standout Ali Harper though, as she would score four second-half goals to knot the teams up at 10-10 after her goal with 1:31 remaining in regulation.

If the game had been divided up into quarters, the Minutewomen might have been able to go home with a victory even earlier as it seemed that UMass simply needed an intermission to focus its attack. Dominating the Crimson during the first half of overtime, the Minutewomen pulled ahead to 12-10 due to goals from senior midfielder Jen Herker and sophomore midfielder Stephanie Pavlick.

The goals kept coming but freshman goalie Jen Nardi still managed to make 13 saves on the day.

"[Nardi] started the game a bit nervous and that showed in her clears," head coach Francesca McClellan said. "That's especially strange for Jen, who is normally a real good clearing the ball. She rebounded well early, and she did that well against Harvard."

Harper continued to venture into the Minutewomen defense undaunted, however, and sent the match into its second overtime by displaying her talent in blazing by two goals in the final 36 seconds of overtime.

Tired after the win over Harvard, UMass still had Holy Cross to contend with and wanted to keep its perfect home and overall records intact. They did just that with a 9-4 win as senior attack Jen Bowen sparked the Minutewomen with a hat trick which included the game winning goal.

The Crusaders continued to hang until a three goal scoring barrage put the game out of reach late in the second half. Naber, Kourtz, and junior midfielder Melissa Anderson each scored in a span of three minutes.

UM women's lacrosse make fine start

By Seth Koenig
Collegian Staff

Welcome to March in New England.

While many college students from the northeastern corner of the United States fled south to spend spring break in the friendlier climate of places like Cancun and Tallahassee, the Massachusetts women's lacrosse team (2-0) anchored down on the suddenly barren Amherst campus to fight the harsh elements and begin their season.

Encountering a sudden snow storm on the day of their opening matchup against the Harvard Crimson on Saturday, March 14, the Minutewomen were forced to postpone the game until the next day, killing any hope for last minute preparations before their Monday follow-up against Holy Cross. On neither day was Mother Nature kind, directing cold winds on the players and leaving them on an unfavorably affected Garber Field.

"Certainly the Harvard game was supposed to be played on Saturday, but it wouldn't quit snowing," UMass coach Francesca McClellan said. "We had to bump it, which worked out fine for us, except that it put us in a position where we had back to back games."

"We were a little tired going in, but again that was a good test for us; to see how well we'd respond when we had to play smart and conserve our energy."

Apparently, the team perfected that art, as they handily defeated the Crusaders with a score of 9-4 only a day after narrowly sliding past the Crimson 13-12 in double overtime. Freshman attack Fay Naber and junior attack Laura Korutz led the early season scoring barrage by beating the opposing goalies eleven times collectively between the two games. Senior attack Jen Bowen followed up her game

Men's lacrosse prepare for BC after defeating rival Hofstra

By Brett Mauser
Collegian Staff

The weekend is over, back to business.

After an emotional 7-6 conquering of the then-No. 11 Flying Dutchmen of Hofstra, there was not much time for the No. 8 Massachusetts men's lacrosse team (4-0) to celebrate the victory. The Minutemen visit cross-state rival Boston College today at 3 p.m. in Boston.

After two consecutive weekends of high winds and a constant flurry of snow, the Minutemen will use this mid- week battle against the hapless Eagles to work out the kinks in preparation for this weekend's home battle with Army.

If today's game resembles those in the past, a fifth win on the season looks well in hand. The Minutemen are 24-0 all- time versus Boston College, yet their hated rivals have kept the games close in the past, including last year's 12-5 battle at Garber Field. UMass's balanced scoring attack was too much for the Eagles to handle, as nine different Minutemen notched at least one goal in the win.

On the 1998 campaign, the Eagles, members of the ECAC, finally got into the win column with last weekend's 10-9 victory over Sacred Heart. They come into today's meeting 1-4 on the season, being outscored 77-28 by their opponents, including a 20-2 thrashing to the hands of No. 5 Duke. They rank 51st in this week's power ratings.

"We have to be mentally focused to play because Boston College always plays us tough," said coach Greg Cannella. "I do not care what their record says, they always give us a great game."

The Minutemen's 4-0 start marks their best start since 1987. That team that started 6-0, but finished 8-3, winning the New England championships, before losing to Penn in the NCAA Tournament. Ironically, Cannella helped that team to prominence.

After the Virginia cancellation, the win over Hofstra finally put the Minutemen on the national map for sure, after three rather easy wins against Holy Cross, Fairfield, and Hartford.

Due to the postponement of the Hofstra game until Sunday, the Minutemen were not able to practice yesterday due to the NCAA rule that states a team cannot work out for seven consecutive days. The mandatory day-off does not allow the team to work on the problems that coach Cannella has noticed thus far in the season.

"Our offense turned the ball over six times in the final quarter against Hofstra, and gave them some opportunities. In one-goal games, you cannot do that. Luckily, though, our defense remained solid."

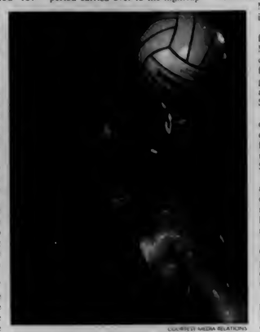
Defensively, the Minutemen rank among the top schools in the nation in goals against. It was two defense-oriented squads, but deeper down, senior goaltender John Kasselakis versus Hofstra's Mark Spruyt, who many magazines had rated as the only goalie in the country better than UMass's All-America candidate Kasselakis took that to heart, and fought off sickness to one-up his Spruyt.

"We have been thinking Hofstra, Hofstra, Hofstra all week, and after expending all that energy on Sunday, the team has to be ready to come out and play against Boston College," said Cannella. "They certainly are not afraid of us."

Women's water polo took on difficult CA schedule

By Paul Teves
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts women's water polo team headed for California with big plans on Friday, March 13th. They accepted the big challenge that awaited them in California, as they put their undefeated record on the line against the best competition in the nation.



UMass began the week with an easy victory over the Redlands 9-2. This win would strengthen the women's resolve heading into their game with No. 6 USC.

With a perfect 7-0 record, the UMass team would put up quite a battle but fall short of USC, 6-5. Junior Andrea Vazquez and sophomore Marcie Hupp each contributed to the UMass cause by netting two goals each, while Claudia Clement added a goal of her own.

UMass outshot USC 18-9, but couldn't put the ball past USC goalie Bernice Orwig enough. She had a strong performance in net making 13 saves.

After suffering the tough loss to USC, UMass had to shrug it off and begin preparing for No. 1 UCLA. The Bruins dominated the first three periods of the match, outscoring UMass 12-0. In the fourth period the Minutewomen finally figured out UCLA, as they were able to outscore them in the fourth 3-2. They seemed to just be controlling the flow of the game before losing the game, 14-3.

Katie Grogan figured out the UCLA defense as she was able to tally three goals in the fourth period, but the firepower of the fourth period carried over to the nightcap two goals in the night cap. Senior Barbara Hickey also netted two goals. The Minutewomen's scoring was rounded out by Hupp, and the freshmen Erin Hillier and Sarah Newell who both chipped in with one goal.

Senior Barbara Hickey and the UMass women's water polo team headed to California over break.

After splitting their first four games, the Minutewomen began concentrating on their final non-tournament game in California against No. 7 San Diego State University.

Despite their valiant effort, UMass lost another close game. They suffered an 11-7 defeat at the hands of San Diego State University (SDSU).

The same names appeared on the score card for UMass. Grogan scored three, while Hickey and Hupp each scored two in the loss.

The UMass week-long California competition proved to be exactly what coach Dan McOsker thought it would be.

"California will be a proving ground for us," McOsker said, "And a chance for us to see what we need to work before we meet these teams again at Nationals."

The Minutewomen have seen the best and now the team can begin to improve on what they need to win close games. This time around being USC and SDSU. In any case, the experience will help them be more prepared for Nationals. UMass finished the week of dual matches in California with a record of 8-3.

UMass at .500 after first 10

By Michael Kobylanski
Collegian Staff

While most of the student body here at the University of Massachusetts was enjoying a little rest and relaxation over spring break, the UMass baseball team was hard at work in the Sunshine State.

The Minutemen went 4-3 during the seven-day Homestead Invitational. UMass downed New York Tech, Dayton, Vermont, and C.W. Post, but fell to Seton Hall, Indiana, and Kent.

"We haven't gotten into a groove yet. We played well at times," Massachusetts coach Mike Stone said. "We've seen glimpses of good hitting and pitching, but our defense has been very inconsistent. We could have won two or three more games so far, but we needed to play better."

UMass (5-5) opened its week with a 9-6 loss to Seton Hall. The Minutemen held a 5-3 lead into the sixth inning, but the Pirates opened the floodgates with five runs in the bottom of the frame. Senior right fielder Pete Gautreau went 4-for-4 with a pair of home runs and four runs batted in against Seton Hall.

New York Tech didn't prove to be much of a challenge for Massachusetts, as locals rolled to a 16-1 win. Muchie Dagliere paced the offensive attack with three hits, three RBI's, and three runs scored. Junior Doug Clark had a pair of hits, including a home run, and four runs batted in. Gautreau and Aaron Braunstein also chipped in a pair of hits. Bill Cooke went seven strong innings while scattering six hits to even his record at 1-1 on the year.

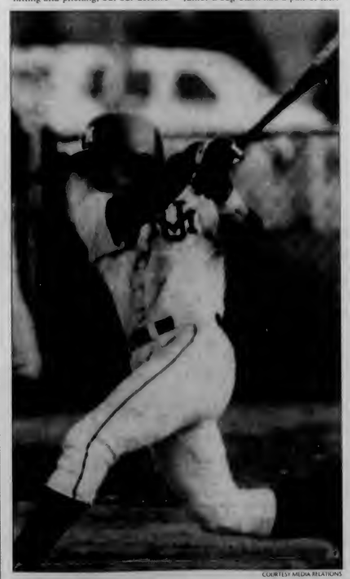
The high-powered offensive attack continued the next day against Dayton, as UMass pounded out 16 hits in a 15-5 rout of the Flyers. Gautreau and Shaun Skeffington each had three hits, and Dagliere and Braunstein added two hits apiece in the victory. Jeff Puleri went four innings in relief to pick up the win.

Vermont was the next victim for UMass, as the Minutemen crushed the Catamounts 18-5. Skeffington and Dagliere each drove in four runs, while Clark had two hits. Sophomore Travis Veracka went seven innings, allowing only two runs on four hits, to earn his first win of the year.

UMass continued to light up the scoreboard against Indiana. Unfortunately, the Hoosiers crossed the plate five more times than the Minutemen in a 12-7 loss. Clark had three hits, including a home run, and three RBI, while Dagliere had two hits in the loss.

A surprising pitchers duel was the story against C.W. Post. It took a run in the eighth to provide the winning margin in the contest. Skeffington, Bryan Mazzaferro, and Clark all had two hits apiece for UMass. Cooke went the distance while allowing only five hits and striking out eight, to notch his second win of the year.

The road trip concluded with a 13-7 loss to Kent. Dagliere and Gautreau each had four hits, while Braunstein and Steve Asadoorian added a pair of hits.



"Steve has been a nice surprise, and has done a great job offensively," Stone said. "Some of our younger guys have given us quality innings and Travis Veracka, Bill Cooke, Jeff Puleri, and Ryan Cameron have all been strong. That's important for us."

However, despite the .500 mark through the opening 10 games, the Minutemen still are in search of the right lineup.

"We're still experimenting with the lineup. Some games we'll think offensive and give it up defensively. Other games we'll go defensively and not have it offensive," Stone said. "It's been hard, but when we finally find it (the right lineup), then we'll be fine."

UMass will return to the diamond today at 3 p.m. when they will travel to Providence to face the Friars.

"Providence is a good team. They are one of the better teams in New England," Stone said. "We have to be ready to play against them. It will be a good matchup."

Britain on alert for anthrax attack

LONDON (AP) — Britain's air and sea ports have been put on alert to the threat of deadly anthrax being smuggled into the country by Iraq, the prime minister's office said Monday.

The all-ports warning follows a threat by Iraqi President Saddam Hussein to flood Britain with the toxin disguised inside "duty free" bottles of alcohol, cosmetics, cigarette lighters and perfume sprays, according to a report yesterday in The Sun, a tabloid newspaper.

The Sun reported that an intelligence document dated March 18 reveals an Iraqi plot to smuggle large quantities of anthrax into "hostile countries."

A spokeswoman for Prime Minister Tony Blair's office confirmed that the document on which The Sun's story is based is authentic. The spokeswoman, speaking on customary condition of anonymity, also confirmed that the government had circulated an all-ports warning, but said there was "no evidence that this plot has been implemented, simply that a threat may have been made."

"Obviously that has to be taken seriously, but we do not believe there is cause for alarm," she said.

Mother uses duct tape to kill daughters

DALY CITY, Calif. (AP) — A mother used duct tape to suffocate her three little girls in their pajamas, then climbed into bed with them and took an overdose of prescription drugs, police said yesterday.

The woman, Megan K. Hogg, 25, was treated at a hospital, then booked for investigation of homicide and taken for a psychiatric evaluation.

Hogg left two notes describing her actions, police said. "In 29 years, I've seen a lot of evil. Nothing like this," said Lt. Steven Lowe.

Hogg's parents found the bodies of 7-year-old Antoinette Marden, 3-year-old Angelique Roberts and 2-year-old Alexandra Hogg in bed next to their unconscious mother Monday morning. Hogg lived with her parents.

"She bound their hands and their faces with duct tape," Lowe said. "She did them one at a time. She took them into the bedroom, suffocated them and came back and got the next one." The officer added: "It takes about five minutes to suffocate someone. Multiply that by three."

Hogg overdosed on several prescription drugs in what Lowe called "a suicide gesture. I don't think she intended to kill herself."

He said one of her notes described what she planned and the other reported what she had done. Police did not release the contents.

Alcoholic Beverage Policy considered for off campus

By Victoria Groves
Collegian Staff

A draft report of the revised Alcoholic Beverage Policy at the University of Massachusetts includes a broad exploration of an extension of the policy to off-campus sites in Amherst.

The draft report regarding changes to the current policy, expected last November, was finally issued to members of the Alcoholic Beverage Policy Task Force on March 18. Although not available to the public because of its tentative form, this is the most extensive change to the current policy, according to committee member and spokesperson for chair Susan Pearson, Kay Scanlon.

However, The Massachusetts Daily Collegian received a copy of the draft from an anonymous source.

The document states that three issues the Task Force recommends looking into include "engag[ing] the appropriate student governance and campus administrative bodies in discussions related to off-campus problems associated with alcohol use. These discussions should explore possible application of the student code of conduct," "consider[ing] whether the Dean of Students Office should begin sending letters to students taken into protective custody off campus," and "explor[ing] the prohibition of kegs."

"It's not ready for the public and it's obviously going to be revised," Scanlon said. "The most significant change is the expansion of the alcohol policy, which previously only covered on campus. The intent of the task force is to extend at least some parts of it to include off campus."

The committee was broken down into subcommittees, including one specifically targeted towards alcohol consumption at off-campus sites. Each member has the opportunity to comment on the draft and return their own revisions to Pearson who will forward them to Chancellor David K. Scott with recommendations. Eventually, the finalized report will be voted on by the Board of Trustees.

Committee members' reports are expected by the end of the month.

Hill Boss, committee and Amherst Select Board member, had not received his copy of the draft, but was pleased with the news of an extension to the policy to include Amherst.

"The town has been fighting for this. I feel it is of critical importance, and would appreciate the University change in policy," Boss said.

Eva Schiffer, a committee and Amherst Select Board member as well, was also happy with the possible changes, but feels that this is still very tentative.

"It's just a draft. It goes to everyone who participated [in the committee] and they will have until the end of the month to make changes. No specifics have been set, but I think it would improve town and university relationships. We need to work together to find a reasonable solution," Schiffer said.

Undergraduate Tom Sadlowski, also a committee member, does not see the possible changes off campus as an issue of concern.

"I think that the bigger issue is what is happening on campus. Off campus can be maintained by the Amherst Police Department because that is their jurisdiction," he said. "UMass should look internally at their own problems before they look externally. There are a lot of problems with the residence halls, the judicial system and campus wide programming.

"If I was to correct the alcohol problem, I'd do it by putting money into programming and resources such as Residential Educational Alcohol Program (REAP)."

For the academic year 1996-97, only 12.5 percent of alcohol policy violators were sanctioned to REAP.

Pearson wrote in a follow-up to the report that "student involvement in this process is essential... [this] is one of the most urgent problems facing college today."

Pearson could not be reached for comment.

Colonial Village fire guts two apartments, damages six others

By Leigh Faulkner and Jill Carroll
Collegian Staff

No one was injured in a fire that destroyed two apartments and damaged six others in the Colonial Village complex early yesterday evening.

Sharon Ferguson, a resident of apartment 70, smelled smoke then called 911 and fled the house.

"My apartment was upstairs. I smelled smoke coming up from downstairs and immediately called 911," she said.

Fire officials said the emergency call was received at 5:08 p.m. Firefighters responded immediately and arrived at the scene to find fire coming out of the first story window and spreading into the second story window.

"The fire came out the first floor window, rolling up the backside into a second story window," Amherst Fire Chief Patrick Brock said at the scene.

A witness to the fire, University of Massachusetts student Tom Elliott, described the scene while standing behind the burning apartments.

"When I first got there it was in the first and second stories then it started going to the roof. Once it got to the roof it just caved in right away," he said.

Arson is being investigated but is not believed to be the cause.

"We have a police officer trained in arson working in the investigation," Brock said, "We don't think so, but it is still under investigation."

Furgason said she heard a candle may have started the fire, however police and fire officials could neither confirm nor deny the rumor.

Police officials said they do not suspect foul play.

"They [firefighters] were doing the best they could to keep the fire contained to that apartment," Elliott said.

The damage done to two of the apartments was severe.

"It's an eight-unit complex. Two have been pretty much destroyed. There is smoke and water damage in the other ones," Brock said.

"Everything is completely gone but everyone is OK and that is all that matters," said Elizabeth Tuff, Furgason's roommate.

"No one was home in the downstairs apartment when the fire began. The building went up really fast," Furgason said.

Elliott also said he witnessed Furgason and Tuff's cat escape the fire by jumping from a second story window.

"The cat was in the second story window. [It] jumped 15 feet out of the window," he said. "Then somebody ran up and covered it with his shirt. I remember seeing when it was running away, it was smoking and had some serious burns.

"When the cat jumped out of the window the entire window was engulfed in flames. On the second floor all you could see was an orange wall of flames."

Furgason and Tuff, who had been standing outside for almost two and a half hours, looked on in disbelief as the fire marshall and firefighters began inspecting the house.

"I am in such shock right now, but I have been comforting everyone around me. I really don't know what to do or what to think," Furgason said, holding back tears.

A small fire appeared on the corner of the roof after the initial blaze had been out but was quickly extinguished.

No other fire victims were available for comment.

Tension increases in Yugoslavia after Serb police, Albanians clash

By Katarina Kratovac
Associated Press

GLAMOC, Yugoslavia — Fierce clashes between Serb police and ethnic Albanians in Kosovo province sent scared villagers fleeing yesterday from the rattle of machine-gunfire and the boom of grenade and rocket launchers. One policeman was reported killed.

The new outbreak of violence, which authorities say began when Albanian separatists with mortars ambushed a police patrol, came on the eve of a conference where the United States was to press strongly for sanctions against Yugoslavia for police repression in Kosovo.

Villagers say heavily armed Serb police surrounded four hamlets in western Kosovo and moved in, launching an action that resembled a Feb. 28 crackdown which left about 80 Albanians dead and prompted an international outcry over alleged human rights violations.

The main party for ethnic Albanians, who outnumber Serbs in Kosovo province 9-to-1, said it was not known whether there were any Albanian casualties. But the Democratic League of Kosovo spoke of a "dramatic" situation and appealed for international help against "Serb aggression."

The clashes also coincided with the clearest signal yet from the leader of Kosovo's Albanians that he was willing to enter into talks with the Serbs on the southern province's future.

Executive privilege for first lady questioned

By Nancy Benac
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Legal scholars voiced skepticism and critics saw Nixonian abuses yesterday in the White House effort to use executive privilege to shield aides from questions about conversations with Hillary Rodham Clinton.

President Clinton himself refused to discuss the issue when asked about it during his Africa trip. But sources familiar with the Monica Lewinsky investigation back home said the administration was trying to claim the privilege to prevent testimony related to discussions with the first lady.

And scholars saw that attempt as a daring one.

"It's a bold claim and quite possibly a real stretch of the doctrine of executive privilege," said Mark Rozell, a political science professor at American University and author of a book on executive privilege.

"This is a step too far," said Jonathan Turley, a law professor at George Washington University and a frequent litigator on constitutional matters. "The first lady is not the tsarina. It is difficult to see how the first lady can assert executive privilege when she is not an executive of this government."

Republican Party Chairman Jim Nicholson raised a comparison with former President Nixon's failed effort to keep White House tapes private during the Watergate investigation, accusing Clinton of "putting the nation through a constitutional crisis."

Nicholson said the president's use of executive privilege was "absolutely bogus, especially with regard to conversations his aides had with Hillary Rodham Clinton."

Executive privilege is the legal doctrine that allows the president to keep talks with his aides confidential, a privilege traditionally limited to matters related to his official duties. The idea of applying the doctrine to conversations involving the first lady has never been tested in court.

White House lawyers invoked executive privilege last week, seeking to shield grand jury testimony by communications director Sidney Blumenthal and longtime Clinton confidant Bruce Lindsey. Starr has

UMass grad offering internships in cross-cultural forensics

By Jason Eiseman
Collegian Staff

It's pretty amazing to get a degree in just two years, but Merle Knight did it.

She came to the University of Massachusetts at Amherst in 1976. In 1977 she was a humor columnist for the Massachusetts Daily Collegian. In May, 1978 she graduated with a Bachelor's Degree with Individual Concentration in foreign languages and linguistics. At 17 years old, she was the youngest person to ever graduate from UMass.

After working in the fields of law enforcement and criminal justice, Knight is back in Massachusetts training private investigators and doing cross-cultural research on crime. She is looking for students who are interested in these lines of work to join her programs.

Internship at the Institution

"It's open to students of all backgrounds," Knight said. She is looking for a student who wants an internship with her groundbreaking organization, the Institute for Cross- Cultural Forensic Studies. The institute is a place for the cross-cultural study of crime and social deviance.

One project Knight is working on now is studying criminal dialects involving gypsy languages, but she is also interested in the media attention given to serial killers, cross-culturally.

This information can be used by law enforcement officials, scholars and public policy makers. The institution is one of the first such scholarly institutions in the country.

She focuses on cross-cultural research because of her specialization in languages — at UMass she studied 12 languages. She now researches in 30 to 40 languages, but her interest has also been in criminal justice.

The tough jobs

After UMass, Knight got a master's degree from Cornell in linguistics. She then moved to California to find the "tough jobs."

She worked at a welfare office which had experienced violence from prisoners from San Quentin Prison who would often come in after their release.

"I was hired for security in some of the roughest areas in Oakland and San Francisco," Knight said. "I was the only female hired in that capacity."

As a prosecutor, Knight worked everything from shoplifting to homicide. She also worked for the Drug Enforcement Agency translating wiretaps which were being used by a task force assigned to stopping the Cali or Columbian drug cartels.

Private Investigator school

Knight trains people for careers as private investigators. She runs a certification program at Westfield State College.

"Private investigation is a booming field all across the country," she said.

Knight said the image of Mike Hammer as the stereotypical private eye is out there, but there are many different fields people can learn. Some P.I.s do dangerous work, but some use mostly the telephone or computer. Knight is experienced with all aspects of the business and can train people.

"You don't even have to have a college education," she said. "Some people put themselves through college working as a private investigator on the side."

She said there is more autonomy with private investigations than with other businesses. There is little or no supervision for a field worker, and it can be a good experience for responsible students. A lot of the jobs in this state are in surveillance, but to do surveillance a reliable car is required.

Knight also teaches a class called "Be Your Own Detective," which teaches people how to find lost friends or siblings, and people who owe money. Everything she teaches is legal, and includes dealing with issues of privacy in her classes.

Knight is the director of International Security Seminars. She talks to companies and individuals about issues of security and privacy. She said she is available to give talks.

She currently lives in Belchertown, and is asking anyone interested in an internship to call (413) 323-4561.

Serb state television, in a brief commentary last night, said the new "terrorist attack" was intended to undermine the prospects for Serb-Albanian talks.

The Yugoslav news agency Tanjug said one policeman was killed and several were injured after a regular police patrol was ambushed near the Kosovo village of Rzic.

The fighting occurred down the dusty track leading from nearby Glamoc, a village of 10 houses 25 miles west of Kosovo's capital of Pristina, toward four Albanian hamlets that were reportedly surrounded by police.

Dazed villagers who escaped the shooting searched for relatives later yesterday.

"I don't know where my family is," said Sadriq Charaj, 18, weeping as he arrived in Glamoc on a horse cart from the scene of the fighting. "They fled."

Albanians in Glamoc said 40 or 50 heavily armed police in bulletproof vests arrived mid-morning yesterday. Shooting began beyond the village shortly afterwards, the Albanians said. Associated Press photographers who reached Glodjane, closer to the fighting, saw police standing outside houses on either side of the road. At one stage, a police helicopter flew overhead. Photographers who made it further down the dirt road had their cars riddled with bullets. The window of one was smashed by an apparent mortar blast, but no one was injured.

Police with an armored personnel carrier blocked journalists from getting any closer to the fighting, but persistent machine-gun fire could be heard at the blockade.

Yugoslav President Slobodan Milosevic, who stripped Kosovo of its autonomy in 1989, has come under intense foreign criticism over continued Serb police repression in the province.

Two weeks ago, he suddenly offered the Albanians talks that his aides said could lead to broad autonomy. But they have ruled out independence for Kosovo, which Serbs consider their national and religious heartland. Serbia is the dominant republic of Yugoslavia. To date, the Albanians have refused to join talks without foreign mediation. Their leader, Ibrahim Rugova, announced yesterday that 15 people would be on the negotiating team.

Milosevic made a series of apparently conciliatory moves on Monday. Serb and ethnic Albanian negotiators signed an agreement to return ethnic Albanian students to state classrooms for the first time in years. In another concession, Serbia released six American activists jailed for failing to register with police, as required by law.

Serbia's Interior Ministry also announced that special police had withdrawn from the Drenica region, site of the earlier crackdown. This had been demanded by the six-nation group that weighs sanctions today.

suspected Blumenthal, a protege of Mrs. Clinton, of leaking information to reporters about the conduct of his prosecutors.

Sources familiar with the investigation said the White House may point to two court rulings in arguing that aides' conversations with Mrs. Clinton should be shielded: one in which the first lady was considered a government official as head of the 1993 health care task force and another extending executive privilege to presidential advisers.

Prosecutors and attorneys for Clinton met for 90 minutes in closed session Tuesday before Chief Judge Norma Holloway Johnson. They declined to discuss the subject of the meeting.

In Africa, Clinton was asked whether claiming the privilege would risk sending a signal that he has something to hide. He told reporters: "That's a question that's being asked and answered back home by the people who are responsible for [it] and I don't believe I should be discussing that."

"I haven't discussed it with the lawyers," Clinton said. "I don't know. You should ask someone who does."

Barbara Olson, a former federal prosecutor and one of the founders of the conservative Independent Women's Forum, said the administration's attempt to apply executive privilege in the Lewinsky case was a stalling tactic that was certain to be rejected by the courts ultimately.

"Presidential dating habits" don't fall within the bounds of privileged communications, she said.

The American Civil Liberties Union criticized Clinton's move to claim executive privilege for his aides and also Judge Johnson's decision to keep the matter behind closed doors.

"The public should not be left in the dark as these vital issues about our system of government are debated and decided," said ACLU legal director Steven Shapiro.

With the American people largely shrugging off the whole Lewinsky matter, pollsters predicted little risk to Clinton in claiming executive privilege, comparisons to Nixon notwithstanding.

"This question about executive privilege is very much a part of the ins and outs of a story that the American public isn't tracking," said Andrew Kohut, director of Pew Research Center for the People & the Press.

Likewise, Democratic pollster Mark Mellman predicted the issue would have "zero effect" on the president's public standing. "People don't believe the ultimate objective here is the search for truth... so that tends to make less important the concept of executive privilege," Mellman said.

Black leaders seek share of tobacco deal

By Alison Fitzgerald
Associated Press

BOSTON — While state and national lawmakers negotiate with the tobacco industry over the medical costs of smoking, black leaders met in Boston yesterday to come up with ways to make sure they get a piece of the pie.

The Rev. Hessie Harris, an organizer of the meeting in Boston's Roxbury neighborhood, said he and others want to ensure that tobacco settlement money goes to anti-smoking programs in minority neighborhoods.

"We want to make sure that we come out with a good social policy that will change the effect on our community," said Harris, a member of Churches Organized to Stop Tobacco.

Recent revelations showed tobacco companies aimed a disproportionate amount of their advertising dollars at the black community. Now black leaders in Boston and in Congress want to make sure blacks get an equally heavy share of any tobacco settlement for anti-smoking programs in their neighborhoods.

Rep. John Conyers, D-Mich., who is black, said he and other minority members of Congress intend to make sure a national settlement would give money directly for anti-smoking programs in the minority areas hardest hit by tobacco.

Rep. Bennie G. Thompson, D-Miss., who is also black, is spearheading the effort by minority members of Congress to "assure that cessation programs operate in the minority community and that they're designed to be culturally effective," a member of his staff said.

According to the federal Centers for Disease Control and Prevention, 25.5 percent of all adults smoke, but 33.9 percent of black men smoke, 33.7 percent of American Indian men smoke, and 33.1 percent of American Indian women smoke.

Lung cancer rates went up 220 percent among black men between 1950 and 1985, while among white men lung cancer increased about 86 percent.

While black leaders work to secure benefits from any tobacco settlement, they are also looking for ways to become less reliant on tobacco industry philanthropy.

Senate rejects making Champlain a Great Lake

By Catherine Strong
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — There are five Great Lakes, not six, the Senate conceded yesterday, undoing a recent vote that flew in the face of what every schoolkid knows.

Sen. Patrick Leahy (D-Vt.), who engineered the earlier elevation of Lake Champlain, went along with the change since it left his original aim intact: helping the University of Vermont snag maritime grants.

Leahy had quietly inserted a sentence into other legislation last month designating Lake Champlain one of the Great Lakes for purposes of the National Sea Grant program.

But he underestimated the wave of controversy that hit after President Clinton signed it into law March 6.

"It snowballed into concerns that we would have to rewrite our encyclopedias or throw out our atlases," Leahy said jokingly on the Senate floor.

Lawmakers from the states that border Lakes Huron, Ontario, Michigan, Erie and Superior saw red. The issue has been on the front pages of newspapers and in editorials across the Great Lakes states for weeks.

"This is not just a tempest in a teapot for those of us who live on the Great Lakes," said Sen. Carl Levin (D-Mich.). "This is a matter of our identity."

"It created a serious perception problem," said Sen. Spencer Abraham (R-Mich.). "Residents of the Great Lakes take great pride in the Great Lakes. The designation of any lake beyond the original five is simply unacceptable."

So Leahy, Abraham and Levin took to the Senate floor to offer to "clarify" the previous legislation — as Leahy put it.

"The purpose of my earlier amendment was not to change any maps, but promote ecological research," he said. "We've agreed to call Lake Champlain a cousin."

Champlain, a 490-square mile lake that straddles Vermont and New York, is puny in size compared to the Great Lakes. The smallest of the Great Lakes, Ontario, is 7,430 square miles.

The government spends $56 million a year for Sea Grant research at nearly 30 universities on lake and sea problems such as pest infestations or pollution.

Harvard officials can't agree on Holocaust chair position

By Robin Estrin
Associated Press

BOSTON — More than three years after Harvard received a $3 million pledge to create a chairmanship in Holocaust studies, the university has been unable to agree on a candidate, and about half of the gift has been quietly diverted to the medical school.

The impasse apparently resulted from academic infighting over how to teach the Holocaust: as a study of Jewish victims and Judaic culture, or as a historical analysis of the Nazi perpetrators.

The candidacy of Daniel J. Goldhagen, an associate Harvard professor, also disturbed some members of the search committee. Goldhagen's controversial 1996 best-selling book, "Hitler's Willing Executioners: Ordinary Germans and the Holocaust," contends that ordinary Germans, not just the Nazis, were responsible for the killing of 6 million Jews. He attributes the Holocaust to deep-seated German anti-Semitism.

By failing to appoint a professor, some say, Harvard missed an opportunity to take the lead as a center of Holocaust scholarship. Although many universities teach the Holocaust through history, religion or literature courses, few of the country's top schools have Holocaust specialists.

"I think it's appalling that Harvard is not endorsing this field of study and is not standing behind it," Deborah Dwork, who runs the new Center for Holocaust Studies at Clark University in Worcester, said yesterday.

In 1994, Kenneth Lipper, a philanthropist, businessman and former New York deputy mayor, endowed the Helen Zelaznik Chair in Holocaust and Cognate Studies to honor a family member who was killed in the Holocaust. Lipper's only condition was that the professor be hired with tenure.

Harvard would not have offered a degree in Holocaust studies. But students would have been able to take courses specifically on the Nazi annihilation of 6 million Jews. Currently, Harvard has no courses that focus exclusively on the Holocaust.

The UMass Theatre Guild presents
Jesus Christ Superstar
A heart-stopping rendition of the Andrew Lloyd Webber rock opera.

The Messiah is coming! The UMass Theatre Guild's spring musical Jesus Christ Superstar hits Bowker Auditorium March 25-28. With a fresh twist on the popular A. L. Webber rock opera and with the talents of Five-College students, the Guild presents yet another extravaganza of singing, dancing and jubilance.

The director, senior Tim Fisk, has steered the musical away from it's preconceived roots in the barren lands of Israel, and set the rock opera in a Las Vegas-like casino, appropriately dubbed, the Hosanna Cabana. But don't be fooled by the glittering lights and fabulous characters. "This is a story about love, intimacy, and poignant human need that is not fulfilled in this world," Fisk said. "It's a tragedy about the loss of an enlightened one. It tells the audience as to show that it's not too late to embrace one another."

The curtain goes up Wednesday, March 25th at Bowker Auditorium and runs through the 28th. There is a Saturday Matinee at 2:00pm, followed by a talk-back session with the cast and artistic team. the Final evening performance will be on the 28th.

Tickets are $5 for UMass Students, and $7 general admission. tickets can be purchased at the Fine Arts Center Box Office, or call 545-2511

This show is sponsored in part by Mr. Fisk, the UMass Arts Council, and the Student Affairs Cultural Enrichment Funds.

The week in review

Last week, we learned that a mile-wide hunk of rock and other space debris was hurtling towards earth, with an estimated arrival date of sometime in October of 2028. But before you could say Armageddon, NASA assured us that the asteroid will miss Earth by about 600,000 miles. That's the good news. The bad news? NASA has been wrong before.

Changes needed at SGA

The resignation of Carlos Alvarez as Chancellor of Elections and the nullification of the election was yet another blow to the suffering credibility of the Student Government Association. Yet the nullification of the elections for SGA president and trustee is not as disastrous for student representation as letting the elections stand would have been.

How can I say this, considering that presently there is no SGA president for next year, and it seems that hours of campaign, debating and voting have been wasted? The elections were run so poorly that the students could not be sure that the person who won was the same person who was voted for the most.

It can be argued that the party divisiveness which is present in the SGA mirrors the national political scene. But even if we can't discern the truth of the latest allegations against President Clinton, at least we can have faith in the electoral process which propelled him into office.

By and large, the races for president and trustee were solid campaigns with more candidates than any election in recent memory. There was a series of forums and debates, culminating with a televised debate on UVC (Channel 19) in which most of the candidates debated the issues and presented their positions articulately.

In addition to the candidates' numerous appearances, efforts by UVC and the Collegian helped publicize the elections and inform students of the candidates' positions and credentials. If all this went so well, why would Eleanor Court (who won the race for trustee) want new elections, and why would the elections chancellor fail to give a report and then resign?

Bryan Schwartzman

The problem is not with the result, but with the very process itself. So many things happened so quickly that it's difficult to see where the democratic process faltered.

First, the night before the elections, three candidates were removed from the ballot. These candidates violated postering rules. Although it occurred at the last minute, it is reasonable that the elections committee disqualified them.

This is not where it ended, though; the tale just got stranger from there. Accusations and counter-accusations arose which involved supposed wrongdoings by the current trustee, Brian Tirell. Then there was a wait for the development of pictures which were supposed to incriminate Amy Pellegrino's campaign staff in tearing down opponents' posters.

The pictures did not prove anything, but this fiasco reinforced the perception of the SGA being divisive and a little bit ridiculous. Yet nothing described so far would cause a voter to doubt the election results.

The Election Committee's handling of the actual election is where the political drama got of hand. For several hours in Franklin Dining Commons, no one could vote for Jesse Burchfield and Brenda Fitzpatrick because their names were covered up. Only three people were supposed to have voted during this time, which lead election administrators to believe it was an insignificant mistake.

Candidates complained that the voting polls in Southwest opened late and closed early, limiting the number of potential votes. Perhaps the worst accusation made by campaign workers is that student IDs were not always checked, creating the opportunity for all kinds of impropriety. Finally, a misreading of the numbers produced a recount and a different outcome.

I'm glad the election was not ratified. I hope it leads to new elections, which could save the legitimacy of the SGA, although I wish Alvarez had lived up to his responsibilities. The unfortunate thing is, no one needs to spend more time preparing for another election when we all have other important things to do!

I'm glad the election was not ratified. I hope it leads to new elections, which could save the legitimacy of the SGA."

Whether they realize it or not, students need the SGA. The body has advocated for students and has made changes that made students' lives a little better. As a graduating senior, I'm disappointed in SGA's condition — and what this election has done to undermine it.

The job of the SGA is not only to imitate the politics of the larger world, but hopefully to do a little better. Running a smooth election is a good starting place.

Canning The Man

*, but we'll get back to that later.

The sheltered white people have struck again. I used to be as diplomatic as Nixon in China when the n-bombs ("naive bombs") were dropped, answering the questions which seemed to be asked solely to prove that inanity still exists in the world. It was my civic duty, I reasoned.

I've mentioned the coif thing (popularly known as "Your hair can't get messed up, right?") before. Then there's the old stand-by, "Do you know The Commodores?" But one of my personal favorites has to be, "You can't tan, can you?" Love to play with that puppy, and this spring break I scratched its belly good.

For those of you who read last year's post-vacation column, you're well aware that there are, in fact, approximately one to one-and-three-quarters degrees of separation left on the entire planet. This is disturbing to me in my burgeoning misanthropy, but my humanistic side kind of digs it.

C. Taylor Connor

Anyway, more unbelievable than my purely platonic relationship with the 5-foot-10 model/actress with whom I shared a hotel room is the chance of running into a UMass contingent in Puerto Rico. Within eight hours of arrival.

There was Iulio, the cherubic, birthing-hipped (he said it) native; Raphael, a fellow native and Desi Arnez sound-alike; Jeremie, the sarcastic Frenchman; and Jen, the girl whose nationalities outnumber her blood cells.

And there was me on my mission: to get blacker than black. Blickity black. Blickity bleckity black. Black black black black black black black.

(How many blacks was that? A lot of blacks.)

I was determined to prove once and for all that the noiring of the noire was wholly possible. With that in mind, we spent our first full day in the rainforest. Not much sun there.

Day three was my first sojourn into le soleil. I admit, I was slightly daunted at the premise of turning myself into a Cajun dish from the outset, so I tossed on some SPF-8. The result was an almost unnoticeable browning. Meanwhile, Kevin the Irish was ready to have his limbs lifted before being plopped into the tank with his crustacean brethren.

This was highly disappointing, even more so than the mindset of the studio executives who green-lighted Blues Brothers 2000. Were I to return to Massachusetts with only a light tan, this whole endeavor would be a whopping failure.

It was as such that I came to understand the true meaning of martyrdom, even if it meant being one of roughly 10 black people in the world with skin cancer. If flipping the bird to The Man meant spending the rest of my days in some clinic next to some overfat, over-the-hill Gamma who'd sucked down Silkwood amounts of gamma radiation on some cheesy Cancun meat market beach, so be it.

Anyway, the challenge was on big time. The fourth day was spent at the beach sans protection. I never even ventured into the water. Damn it, there would be crispiness or death. Once again, however, failure guffawed heartily in my face, which had shifted from mocha to mochier.

Nothing of note still.

That night, after several glasses of milk, the preferred beverage of varsity athletes everywhere, I had a mortifying nightmare. I dreamt I had returned to the States, back to UMass. The black-and-tanning naysayers surrounded me in an interrogation room not unlike the one used by the cops in L.A. Confidential, the film that should have won Best Picture. Suddenly, the questions began.

"Do you think Clubber Lang should have won?"

"Can you dunk?"

"Do you live in the hood?"

"Would you and your mom like to visit the land of the magical poop monkeys and flying Gore daughters?"

(Oh, like, you've never dreamt about that last one before.)

I awoke from the slumber in a blinding, blustery rage. What if I dropped that proverbial ball? Maybe I'd reached my sun-saturation point — The Man would be victorious. But no, I wouldn't let that sort of mad talk bring me down. Refuse to lose, refuse to lose. (Hopefully, the Collegian will cover the cost of using that Cal-copyrighted catch phrase.)

Raphael and crew arrived early the next morning, at approximately 7 a.m. I rumbled out of my bed and packed a day bag. Laura, the aforementioned Amazon, awoke briefly to ask, "What's that for?," as I stuffed a large tin can into the sack.

"Oh, nothing," I replied.

My new friends and I took the hour-long ferry to Culebra, an island just off the coast of Puerto Rico. I slept the entire time, but somehow unconsciously heard them talking about the strange bulge in the backpack. An easy smile fell over my face.

We reached the beach via bus and set up our gear in the sand. Everyone started applying their various strengths of sunblock until, grinning, I pulled out The Can. The Can to defeat The Man — Pennzoil 1040 Motor Oil.

I slathered the ebony goo about my arms, legs, face, torso, back, etc. And then I sat out in the sun for five hours. Flipped over a couple times to make sure I was done.

I won. Conner 1, The Man 0.

And while my charbroiling may have faded a tad since my return to New England, I can go down a righteous brother for once having looked like this: •.

The columns should be between 700–800 words long, and may be submitted to the Collegian in person, by e-mailing "letters@oitvms.oit.umass.edu" or by faxing 545-1592. Covering for Clinton

According to The Boston Globe, President Clinton really isn't so bad. Even if he did really come on to all those women, even if he did it as crudely as they say, at least he stopped.

Yes, that's right, the Globe argued that Clinton should be lauded for backing off when women refuse his advances. As opposed to raping them, I assume.

No, this isn't a bad joke. On last Thursday's (3/19) front page, the Globe ran an article entitled, "Clinton? He knows 'No'", in which staff writer Lynda Gorov wrote that although thousands of American women are "dismayed" and "disgusted" with Clinton, they continue to show loyalty to him because "at least he seems to understand that no means no."

Tamar Carroll

Well, by all means, as an American woman, I am relieved that the president understands that no means no. I am so relieved, in fact, that I think I may apply for a White House internship. Who knows, the president may drop his pants in front of me, place my hand on his penis or initiate an affair, but at least he'll know that no means no. Because that's what's really important, right? I might be humiliated and degraded, or intimidated into complying with his wishes, but at least I won't be actually raped. Whew, I feel better already. Don't you?

Not that the Globe stopped there. Gorov went on to quote Los Angeles women saying Americans shouldn't expect anything more from Clinton, because, after all, he is a man, and men do sexually harass women; don't they?

"It's reality, and we shouldn't expect Clinton to be anything different," said Susan Nassberg, described as "a marketing and advertising executive in Los Angeles."

Oh, really? I don't know about you, Susan, but that's not my idea of reality, and I absolutely do expect something different from my president. Maybe things are different out there in California, but I certainly don't expect my male colleagues down here at the Collegian to drop their pants in front of me and demand oral sex.

Sure, they are male, and some of them may be my superiors, but that does not give my co-workers the right to make sexual advances toward me. And, although it might surprise Nassberg, they don't. That's right — we function (quite well even, I'd like to think) without sexually harassing each other. Kind of like how my dad and his female secretary get along. His "reality" doesn't include groping her, either — even when she asks for a raise.

I'd like to think I could expect at least as much from the president as I do from my male co-workers. I wouldn't find it acceptable if they did to me any of the things Clinton is accused of doing to various women, and I don't find his actions — if he did do these things — acceptable, either. However, my point is not with the president, but rather with the Globe, which ran these ridiculous statements about sexual harassment across its front page.

Just what message is the Globe trying to send when it features Elizabeth Fassberg (this time a New Yorker) saying, "sexual harassment is just a part of life?"

Really? So, then, I guess racism is just a part of life. Anti-Semitism, too, I suppose. And homophobia. Heck, why try to combat any injustice at all? They're all just a part of life.

Again, I ask, what message was the Globe trying to send? Why not quote any women opposed to accepting sexual harassment in the article? Why enlarge Fassberg's comment in a pull quote across the page?

Sounds a lot to me like the Globe is saying, "Shut up and take it, women. Stop complaining, because things aren't going to change." When coupled with this past Sunday's Focus piece (3/22), in which the Globe noted sexual harassment proceedings are often so stressful for the victims that many counsellors advise women not to press charges at all, an interesting picture of the Globe's message to women evolves.

"Shut up and take it. Because if you don't, you will be punished."

Perhaps the Globe is just trying to support the president. Whatever its motives, though, it is time for the paper's editors to wake up and take responsibility for spreading messages like "sexual harassment is just a part of life" across its front page.

Sexual harassment is wrong and illegal. It is not a necessary part of life, and it can be eliminated — by refusing to tolerate it. This American woman, for one, will not accept sexual harassment as "just a part" of her life. I expect more from my co-workers, more from my president, and, most of all, more from my newspaper.

The Doublethink of the 90s

The culinary arts

None other than the president of Dow Jones, Karen Elliott House, came forward with sound advice for President Clinton during his moment of deliberation over Iraq.

Recounting a 1990 interview she had had with Saddam before the invasions, Ms. House wrote, "I asked how he felt about being known as the butcher of Baghdad. Without hesitation or remorse, he replied: 'Weakness doesn't assure achieving the objectives required by a leader.' Then, without any similar hesitation or remorse, Ms. House drew the obvious conclusion. "That's sound advice for President Clinton," she said, "as he contemplates using force against Saddam..."

Then he too can earn the coveted title of the butcher of Bahgdad? Or, Ms. House, how about butcher of the month? (Wall Street Journal, 2/11)

Crop failures

February's award for Best Defense of U.S. Policy in Iraq goes by acclamation to Secretary of State Madeleine Albright.

In Ohio, Ms. Albright faced a large audience described by an unnamed senior State Department official as showing "general support for our position despite a few bad apples." One of the bad apples quoted a statement by President Carter that 100,000 Iraqi civilians could be killed if we started bombing again.

In a response that failed to gain the press attention it may have deserved, Ms. Albright did not bother to deny the figures. Instead she announced, "I am willing to make a bet to anyone here that we care more about the Iraqi people than Saddam does..." Air Force personnel were reportedly working around the clock to carve the message "We care more" on U.S. bombs.

Ms. Albright finished by reaching out to gang members and drive-by shooters with this argument: "If he does the totally uncivilized thing of putting women and children to guard his regime, then the fault is his." (New York Times, 2/19)

Modern farming

What is the value of a human life? How could we even determine it? Fortunately, these age old philosophical questions now have answers.

Or at least we know the value of a human embryo, which is, of course, $5,100. That's $5,000 for the egg and $100 for the sperm, which may seem a tad bit unfair until you consider the testing hormone treatments and suctioning that women must endure to produce marketable eggs.

How is this value determined? According to Dr. Joseph Schulman, the price is "ultimately determined by the balance between supply and demand." What else could it be?

With medical centers willing to ante up big amounts, fertility specialist Dr. Mark Sauer reports that "egg donation is becoming like an auction." That's why it only seems natural the process of siphoning out women's eggs is now referred to as "harvesting." (New York Times, 2/25)

Small ain't beautiful no more

Those of you still spouting environmental themes about consuming less and living lightly upon the planet need to check out the latest ads for the Lincoln Town Car. You are out of date.

The latest Lincoln magazine ads feature the "spacious comfort," "distinctive design," and "quiet elegance" we would expect from a luxury car. But this stylish sedan has attitude as well.

As the ad's headline proclaims, "This should finally put an end to all that 'less is more' nonsense." They then ask the critical question: "Whose idea was this 'less is more' business anyway. Certainly not ours."

Most certainly not! Lincoln knows what it proudly stands for. Its raison d'être — "Because having it all is what this car is all about." It must feel great being all the way out of the closet. (U.S. News, 3/2)

Post flyers on boards, not all over campus

To the editor:

As an employee in the Custodial Service Department of the Physical Plant, I want to express my displeasure with the people who hung fliers/"vote for me" posters all over the place, including ceilings, doors, windows, side walks, trees and on top of other fliers.

Why can't you use the building event or classroom bulletin boards? Why do you stick posters on a clean surface, such as a ceiling, wall, window or table top?

The week of March 2, when the posters appeared, Custodial Services spent 100-plus labor hours — in the buildings — removing illegally posted signs. The labor hours spent should have been used cleaning classrooms, restrooms and offices. We can't accomplish this when we're using valuable labor hours because of the inconsiderate behavior of a few. Your consideration in this matter will be appreciated.

Vote in GEO elections

To the editor:

When I signed my contract for a research assistantship, I was asked if I wanted to contribute to the Graduate Employee Organization (GEO). "What's that?" I asked. The answer made me giggle: A worker's union for graduate students. Ridiculous.

As it turns out, GEO didn't leave me alone. My paycheck showed a deduction for GEO even though I had specifically declined to support them. First, I had to go to Whitmore to fill out a form to refuse again, then I had to go to the GEO to ask for my money back. The man I spoke with there explained that there will be elections this today and tomorrow to decide whether or not GEO will have the right to automatically deduct its fees from every graduate student's paycheck, since every graduate student benefits from GEO's work. Apparently, GEO isn't worried about me, but is very interested in my paycheck.

I wish to be left alone to pursue my education. I am appalled that some non-governmental organization that I am not a member of and have absolutely no interest in is now imposing itself upon me. I owe you nothing. Of course, there won't be too many "no" votes if no one outside of GEO knows about the referendum. Nice plan on their part.

If we don't all vote on this, there will not be a fair result and those of us who are not members of GEO will have to pay against our will. The vote is tonight and tomorrow night, 4–9 p.m.

Act your age

To the editor:

The Graduate Employee Organization (GEO) is the union we have been hearing about non-stop since the beginning of the semester. This is composed of graduate teaching assistants who basically have been doing nothing but whining and complaining because of a supposed inadequate stipend.

Every student on campus cringes when they walk through the Student Union and pass the GEO office covered with asinine signs, and a Publisher's Clearing House sized check addressed to the Chancellor. Although TAs do a fair amount of work in lectures, they are also students and must realize they are not professors. These graduate students are usually 23 and above, but do they act it? Hardly. Throughout campus GEO has left its mark, and showed the world how obnoxious its members truly are. They mar the Whitmore building with sidewalk chalk demanding a new contract, and then wear picket signs stating things like, "Impasse my ass." Remind me; did I say 23 or 13? In closing, GEO is nothing but a menace to the University, expressing nothing but immature views, borderline illegal ideas and actions, and deserve nothing but a "time out." The recent compromise made by GEO and the Chancellor to increase TAs' base salary from $7,000 to $9,000 was nothing more than sticking a "binky" into a screaming baby's mouth.

STUDENT VIEWPOINTS ACROSS THE NATION

Gay marriages — why not?

Morals, for all Rep. Lorraine Seratti's righteous indignation, are largely evolutionary.

Fifty years ago, it was acceptable to intern, or shall we say "detain," Japanese-Americans. One-hundred years ago, it was commonplace to work children 14 hours a day. One-hundred-fifty years ago, killing Native Americans was a national sport and slaves were as ubiquitous as Scarlett O'Hara's beaus.

Science, technology, art, fashion, culture, sport — they all change. Why should morality not keep with the times?

Katie L. Fetting

The supervening socio-political attitude in the United States that judges ethics to be static, definite and delineated is faulty. Those of us who have studied law and crammed a bit of history recognize morals as messy. Very rarely does a Lex Luthor exist, and just as rarely, a Superman.

For this reason, Wisconsin's state government is highly illogical when it attempts to rub out "immorality" with statutes. The latest and greatest from the deep well of dubious legislation is Assembly Bill 104, a Seratti-sponsored ban on same-sex marriages.

However introductory the issue proves in Wisconsin, neither the prohibition of unorthodox marriages nor the homosexual lifestyle are novel.

Infamous for their malice and close-mindedness, the Nazis enacted the Nuremberg laws in the 1930s, a series of ordinances which made gentile-jew marriages illegal. The American South was likewise guilty of marital discrimination when Jim Crow-era laws discouraged black-white relations. What was the justification for such legitimized bigotry? Why, maintaining the moral fabric of the nations, of course.

Proponents of the bill will cite homosexual marriage as a cheapening of the institution. It seems heterosexuals beat them to it. Maybe it has something to do with the divorce ratio, or the 25-second marriages of celebrities, or the adultery of a representative (or two). Of course these things are not judged "immoral," merely unfortunate.

I wonder what effect supporters of the bill anticipate the legislation will have. Will homosexuality disappear? Since the lifestyle appears to have been kicking around at least since those dastardly Greeks, it is doubtful a bill by the Wisconsin Legislature will change anything. But will more heterosexual marriages survive? This hasn't proved true thus far.

The reasons to allow gays to marry are more compelling. First of all, any time a majority can appease an oppressed minority with little or no consequence, it should be done. Secondly, it expedites many legal questions arising from the existing "domestic partner" classification. Some companies are sympathetic to the situation and some are not. Allowing homosexuals to enter into a marriage contract will extend employee benefits universally, as well allowing them to achieve the true American dream: a better tax bracket.

But the debate is truly about fear. Fear of someone unlike ourselves. Fear of gay behavior. Fear that homosexuality is contagious. While these are normal emotional responses to dissimilar lifestyles, these are not reasons for prohibitory legislation. "Equal protection under the law" is about fairness, not fear.

So we're back to morality. Will homosexual marriage destroy the nation's moral fabric? I think we're pretty safe. After all, if executing Native Americans, interning the Japanese, and putting 19th century kids to work didn't, I don't know what will.

'Being prepared' for controversy

"A Scout is: trustworthy, loyal, helpful, friendly, courteous, kind, obedient, cheerful, thrifty, brave, clean and reverent." — Scout law

Being a card carrying Eagle Scout isn't easy. Besides questions of knowledge (Hey, Eagle boy, what kind of mushroom is this?), issues of preparedness (Oh, my God, they've seriously injured Kenny! Does anyone know first aid?), and other practical concerns (Hey, can anyone here tie a bowline on a bite?), there are also the ever-present wisps of moral dogma exhorting me to "do my best," to "do a good turn daily" and to "help other people at all times." Twelve years of Scouting has been a most savory stew: a stock of wonderful experiences, chunks of meaty knowledge and a garnish of basic moral precepts and cilantro. As I cherish all that Scouting has wrapped around my heart (like ivy), and firmly wish that every boy could be given such an opportunity, I should be extraordinarily happy that Scouting has come out of the stone age and is now forced to accept openly gay members.

Dan Greenberg

For years, the Boy Scouts of America has been taken to court for being discriminatory. Recently, however, a New Jersey court upheld the plea for readmission of a Scout who was evicted from the organization after speaking at a gay rally. According to the Scouts, he broke a part of the Scout oath that dictates that a Scout be "morally straight." The court stated that though the Boy Scouts is a private organization, it makes a non-exclusionary appeal to the general public and must therefore accept all sexual orientations. This decision poses problems to the basic nature of the Scouting program.

Scouting is an organization designed to provide knowledge and morals in a manner that is completely free from any sexuality. To this end, adults seeking to enter the organization are screened, and extensive training is provided to ensure that no sexual situations develop between leaders and boys, boys with boys, or leaders and leaders. While Boy Scouts are still against all sexual relations, these policies, geared towards adults, will remain constant.

At present, there is deliberately no sexual policy for boys in the organization. Allowing openly gay boys in the program would force the Boy Scouts to address matters of sex. It would necessitate the institution of an anti-sex policy for boys. Though this policy would coincide with the established policy for adults, the resulting system would be fundamentally different, in an effort to "be prepared," the Scouting organization would have to address matters of sexuality as opposed to the present system of ignoring them. This would change the nature of the Scouting program.

Another important consideration is that the Boy Scouts of America is a private institution. Unlike the ROTC program and Douglass College, two discriminatory institutions in a publicly sponsored school, Scouting receives no grants from the federal government, a fact which allows the organization to restrict their membership.

This right of the Boy Scouts to restrict membership, however, was disallowed by the court decision that cited the non-exclusionary call to "all boys." Because of the nature of the program itself, there is no easy internal solution that could have kept the deliberately asexual nature of the program while appeasing the court. The organization begins to accept boys when they are roughly seven years old, and it is impossible to change the "appeal" of recruitment to include only heterosexual boys (if this, indeed, is the desire of the Scouting program). In addition, it is cruel and mean-spirited to eject boys from the program who decide to come out (a boy can remain a Scout until his 18th birthday).

Though the Boy Scouts of America is outdated and backwards in its sexual policy, the organization, as a private institution, has the right to be. Forcing the group to fundamentally change its sexual (or any other) policy was immoral, despite good intentions. Fundamental change to Scouting should be done by the Scouting organization, not by a court — or not at all.

"On my honor, I will do my best to do my duty to God and my country and obey the Scout law; To help other people at all times; To keep myself physically strong, mentally awake and morally straight." — Scout oath

Killah Priest is beyond religion, Posies put the emphasis on singing

HEAVY MENTAL Killah Priest
Geffen

"Your arms are too short too box with God." This opening line from "One Step" sets the tone for this album. Killah Priest is busting the lyrical four-four on the hip-hop community and he comes armed with knowledge and the ability to spit deadly lyrics.

While Wu-Tang may have gained notoriety through the efforts of Method Man and Old Dirty Bastard it was the GZA, Raekwon, and Ghost Faced Killer whose ability to drop deep lyrics that made them special. "C.R.E.A.M." was a brilliant song, but it did have a message.

Killah Priest also has a message, that heaven can be found on Earth if we look hard enough. Killah Priest spouts forth from all forms of religion to prove his point, and at the same time criticizes the traditional church. While his message may seem convoluted at times, you have to remember that as an African-American it is not surprising he would be skeptical of the church.

Have no fear, this album goes beyond just religion. Priest has a message for all the corny MCs too: "Too many rappers in the east want to be gangsters/Too many gansters in the west want to be rappers/Bunch of actors/I ought to smack ya/Whose your master/Sit down take a lesson/Stop guessing," from "Fake MCs." While the Priest may not deliver his warning with the grace of De La Soul he gets his point across.

The single "Cross My Heart" features Inspectah Deck and Genius/GZA and should be taking over your airwaves. When's the last time you heard someone talk about the "Elohim" on the radio. Members of the Sunz of Man, most notably Hell Razzah, Killah's group association, also appear all over this album and compliment their leader quite well. ODB or O'Cyrus appears on "If You Don't Know" and his wild style is a perfect compliment for the more subdued Priest. This is a Wu-Tang joint so most of the producing is brilliantly handled by RZA.

The title track "Heavy Mental" showcases RZA's talent when he samples a dijiridoo and provides one of the most haunting tracks in hip-hop.

To really enjoy Heavy Mental, you have to cut down to Killah Priest's voice and listen to all that he has to say. While I wouldn't put him in the same category as De La, Tribe or Guru, I would say that he is not far from attaining that status. A- (Adam Diugacz)

SUCCESS
The Posies
Pop Llama

Trax On Trax Off

After the crash and burn of their last major label release, Amazing Disgrace, it was no surprise to hear that The Posies were calling it quits. Having never made good on all the promise they'd shown, though, it was a disappointing end to an otherwise exciting career. Luckily, The Posies also seemed uneasy with their messy end and have put together a more fitting swan song, the aptly titled Success.

Stripping away the arena rock excess of their past two albums, The Posies go for a more intimate, almost demo- like feel on Success and the results are positively sparkling. The songs get to shine on their own, and the forced bombast of "Amazing Disgrace" makes way for a more honest band sound — like eavesdropping in on a rehearsal.

Maybe they felt like they had nothing more to prove, or maybe they just remembered what a great band they were when they weren't trying to puff themselves up. Whatever the case, it's marvelous to hear the beautiful harmonies of frontmen Ken Stringfellow and Jon Auer ringing through stripped-down arrangements — putting the emphasis back on the singing and the subtleties of the songwriting, instead of drowning them in an overwhelming mess of clever production. Not that The Posies have abandoned the power pop roar altogether. Songs like "Looking Lost" and "Fall Apart With Me" thunder along as ferociously as the best of Amazing Disgrace, but it rings true this time out alongside gentler fare like "Every Bitter Drop" and the mood driven "Start a Life."

It's sad to see them go after such a fantastic return to form, but it's about as good an encore as you're likely to hear. Not too many bands can claim that their last gasp was also one of their best. A (Bradley Skaught)

The GETAWAY PEOPLE
The Getaway People
Tangerine

What's the first place that comes to mind when you think of the blues? If you said Stavanger, Norway, then one of two things is true: number one, you're a wacko, or two, you've heard the self-titled debut from the Getaway People. Combining traditional blues, soul and the loops, samples and scratching prevalent in today's hip-hop, they create a sound that is at once novel and familiar.

Together since 1994, the Getaway People give life to a funky, authentic blues sound — their Norwegian roots are well hidden. The album covers a broad range of topics such as race relations, love and cruising in limousines. This mix keeps the record from becoming preachy, although at times lead singer Boots sounds like he's trying too hard to play the role of blues hipster.

The band balance their sense of humor and their conscience well. Tracks such as "Chocolate," "She Gave Me Love" and "Blind" treat relationships with oddball metaphors and a sharp wit. Moreover, the Getaway People show their introspective side on "Does My Colour Scare You?" a slow, soulful examination of race relations and plastic people — an ostentatious track dealing with individuality. Both are thought provoking, though the latter comes off as pretentious.

The Getaway People's first release is an infectious collection of urban rhythms, effectively conjuring up images of just about everything except Norway. A (Brendan Lynch)

Killah Priest broadcasts his message loud and clear on Heavy Mental.

Titanic big winner at the box office & the Oscars

By Bob Thomas
Associated Press

LOS ANGELES — The makers of Titanic looked for a night to remember at the Academy Awards on Monday, with the $200 million disaster epic a contender to replace Ben Hur as the biggest Oscar winner ever.

The three-hour romance set on the doomed luxury liner has already smashed box office records, overtaking Jurassic Park as the biggest moneymaker in movie history, with more than $1.1 billion. It has also been No. 1 at the U.S. box office for an unprecedented 14th weekend in a row.

Ben Hur won 11 Oscars in 1959. Titanic went into the evening with 14 nominations, tying the record set by 1950's All About Eve.

The other contenders for best picture at the 70th Academy Awards were:

• L.A. Confidential, a film noir starring Kevin Spacey as a cop in 1950s Los Angeles.

• As Good as It Gets, a romance between a misanthrope, played by Jack Nicholson, and a working mother, played by Helen Hunt.

• Good Will Hunting, starring Matt Damon as a working-class genius.

• The Full Monty, a comedy about laid-off British factory workers who form a male stripper act. The film was made for a mere $3.5 million with a cast unknown to American audiences.

Individual favorites included Nicholson for best actor; Helena Bonham Carter of The Wings of the Dove, for best actress; Burt Reynolds of Boogie Nights, for best supporting actor; and Gloria Stuart of Titanic for best supporting actress.

Billy Crystal had the duty of keeping the three-hour-plus show on course. After a three-year absence, he resumed as emcee last year with terrific results.

This year's Oscar pageant was a celebration of comebacks, with a batch of nominees who had been largely forgotten, including Peter Fonda, Julie Christie, Robert Forster and the 87-year-old Miss Stuart.

The nostalgia theme extended to the ceremony's invitation list. The Academy invited every living winner of the supporting and lead acting awards.

The worldwide TV audience was projected at 1 billion. The ratings were expected to be up over last year's disappointing numbers, largely because of the monster draw of Titanic, which has made nearly $500 million in North America.

Arizona to unveil its showpiece; Williams heads out to a ballgame

PHOENIX (AP) — Two words describe Bank One Ballpark.

Huge. And unique.

From the retractable roof 196 feet above the field to the centerfield scoreboard that's 85 feet high, this place is big. Its 1.3 million square feet could hold eight copies of the America West Arena, where the NBA Suns and NHL Coyotes play.

Yet despite its size, the stadium with the look of a brick warehouse has the feel of an old-time ballpark, with some state-of-the-art touches.

It's the first retractable-domed stadium with natural grass, not to mention a swimming pool, heated spa and swim-up bar beyond the right-centerfield fence.

"It's a showpiece," said Diamondbacks chairman Jerry Colangelo. "It's going to be a unique attraction that's also going to promote baseball with its amenities."

Fans enter the park along a concourse lined with has pastels featuring great moments in baseball history. There's a "Cooperstown West" museum with memorabilia loaned from the Baseball Hall of Fame and a 10,500-square-foot interactive baseball theme park in back of the centerfield stands.

The field, with its shade-tolerant hybrid grass and unique double warning track, sits 25 feet below street level. There's 48,500 seats and the Diamondbacks insist there's not a bad one in the house.

In the lower deck, there's a good two feet of leg room, even with a cup holder behind each of the curved green chairs.

Twelve elevators and eight escalators transport fans to the upper deck. From the top row, it almost feels like you can reach out and touch the motor-driven roof that opens or closes in approximately five minutes.

During the hottest summer days, 8,000 tons of air conditioning from tan-colored pipes ringing the lower level will cool the stadium by 30 degrees in 3 1/2 hours.

"We'll leave the roof open whenever we can — probably for half the season," stadium project manager John Wasson said. "But for some night games in the middle of summer, we can close the roof about 11:30 a.m. and have the place cooled down nicely by 4 p.m."

Wasson expects an annual electric bill of $2 million.

There are 61 portable concession locations and 38 fixed concessions stands, including three McDonald's. There's also the glass-enclosed Arizona Baseball Club restaurant in right field, T.G.I. Friday's Front Row Sports Grill with an open balcony overhanging the lower left-field bleachers and Leinenkugel's Ball Yard Brewery in the tree-lined main plaza.

The Diamondbacks' 20,000-square-foot locker room has 40 oak-paneled dressing cubicles, each with a built-in mirror and safe. The bathroom and showers are tiled in team colors. There's a bank of televisions, a steam room, three Jacuzzis, a training pool and an exercise and weight room. Next door are two batting cages. The 7,500-square-foot visiting clubhouse has one TV, nondescript carpeting, smaller cubicles and no vanity mirrors — but the bathroom area is tiled in Diamondbacks' hues.

So is the 30-foot-15-foot pool and spa, which also features a barbecue area and will be rented to groups of up to 35 people. Most of the best seats are sold. Fans have bought 35,000 season tickets, at prices between $285 and $4,050. But some 7,000 seats are reserved for game-day sales at less than $6, including 400 at $1 apiece.

Williams enjoys afternoon at the ballpark

CLEARWATER, Fla. (AP) — Ted Williams took his hands off the walker and danced a little jig.

"I'm pretty good," said the Hall of Famer, attending his first spring training game in several years yesterday. "I can't see as well as I like, so, as a result, I lose a little balance. That's why I have to use this."

Williams, who turns 80 on Aug. 30, made the 75-minute trip from his home in Hernando to watch his Boston Red Sox defeat the Philadelphia Phillies, 2-1.

Although he "watches on TV all I can," Williams said it was the first spring training game he'd attended in three or four years.

Williams said he came to see the two players he had named the Ted Williams Rookies of the Year earlier this spring, Boston's Nomar Garciaparra and Philadelphia's Scott Rolen.

But Garciaparra, who played in an exhibition game in Tampa on Monday, returned to the Red Sox's spring training home in Fort Myers after the game and didn't accompany the team to Clearwater.

"The Phillies called us late yesterday afternoon and said he (Williams) was coming, but that he was coming to talk to Scott," Shea added. "We wish it had been set up through us and we would have made sure Nomar was there."

Williams acknowledged he was disappointed at missing Garciaparra, but said he was eager to get his first glance at Rolen.

"He's quick," Williams said as he watched Rolen at the plate. "He's going to be a good hitter. He stands in there good."

Rolen said Williams told him, "the key to hitting is to get a good pitch."

As for Garciaparra, Williams said he's seen the Red Sox shortstop many times and had numerous discussions about hitting with him.

"He not only has as great a talent as I ever saw, he's a smart, intelligent kid who knows all about what to do hitting," he said. "The sky is absolutely the limit for him."

The appearance of the man many consider to be the game's greatest hitter sent a wave of energy through Jack Russell Stadium. Fans and players stood and cheered as Williams shook hands with Rolen before the game.

Nielsen just may make a difference as Flyers coach

Since I am not the kind of person who will not admit when I am wrong, my first order of business is to take back a comment I made last time out.

Maybe Roger Nielsen can make a difference as a coach. Maybe.

I figured that a change in coaches wouldn't be beneficial to a Flyers

Michael Kobylanski
NHL

team that was second in the Atlantic Division. After all, it seemed like Wayne Cashman was just getting sand–bagged, and this move would only hurt the Flyers.

Boy, was I wrong.

The resurgent Flyers have been steamrolling their opponents as of late, and have closed the gap with first–place New Jersey to 10 points with 14 games to play. Is that deficit impossible to tackle? No. The two teams squared off last night, and as long as Philadelphia continues to weather the storm before Eric Lindros comes back, things will be fine and dandy in the City of Brotherly Love.

• I was disappointed, to say the least, when I found out that there weren't any blockbuster deals before yesterday's 3 p.m. trading deadline. Although there was speculation that big names like Jeremy Roenick, Alexander Mogilny and Pat LaFontaine were heading to new locations, nothing materialized.

Instead, we have to be content with Jeff Brown heading to Toronto in exchange for Sylvain Cote. Wow, what a trade.

There were some teams that could have made a deal to help themselves. Detroit was one of them, and they picked up Dimitri Mironov to help bolster their defensive corps.

Others, like New Jersey, who could have used another scoring threat, sat back and did nothing. The Devils have the best record in the Eastern Conference, but they can't expect Martin Brodeur to hold down the fort and allow only a goal or two every game.

Although it takes defense and goaltending to win championships, you need to score a couple of goals along the way, too. Guys like Bobby Holik and Doug Gilmour aren't exactly as potent of a duo as Jaromir Jagr and Ron Francis.

• And speaking of Francis, he tallied his 1,000 career assist last week. Congratulations to the former Whalers captain for reaching that milestone and for continuing to play at the game's top level after all these years.

• I finally figured out who is benefitting the most from playing in the shadows of Jagr and Francis: it's Stu Barnes. It seems like every time I'm watching SportsCenter (which isn't too often because we don't get ESPN on campus) this guy is finding the net. But hey, it's not that hard when all you have to do is take feeds from two of the game's greats and put the biscuit in the basket.

• It's time to finally give up on the Rangers. I don't care who criticizes me on this one, but they are all done. They trail Ottawa by five points with 12 games to play, and face a treacherous schedule over the next week. All I have to say is "Start the bus, John Muckler." The bus to the off–season, that is.

• Well, as the playoffs draw nearer, there are several interesting races. Washington, Boston, Montreal and Buffalo are all duking it out for home–ice advantage in the East, while Ottawa is trying to hold off the Rangers and Carolina for the eighth and final playoff spot.

Out West, things are just as much of a mess. Dallas, Detroit, Colorado and St. Louis all seem to have home–ice sewed up, but the five through eight spots aren't as clear– cut. Los Angeles still has a chance to catch the Blues, and Chicago, Edmonton and Phoenix are jostling to reach the promised land. Other teams with a shot to make the playoffs include San José, Toronto, Calgary and Anaheim.

• It's sad to say that this is the first year in over a decade that I haven't made it out to an NHL game. Why you ask? First, Hartford moved to Carolina, and second, I hate the Bruins. I refuse to go to the FleetCenter to watch the Black and Gold play. Oh well, maybe I'll start the streak again next year.

• Finally, Ray Bourque dropped the gloves for the first time in over a decade last week. It's good to see the Bruins star trying to win at something. After all, he's not going to win a Stanley Cup before he retires.

Lax downs BC for 25th straight time

DelPercio continues offensive tear

By Casey Kane
Collegian Staff

A battle between a team with no losses and a team with no wins produced no surprises as the No. 8 Massachusetts men's lacrosse team rolled over Bay State rival Boston College, 12–6, yesterday at Alumni Stadium at Chestnut Hill.

The Minutemen showed no signs of fatigue despite getting just one day of rest after Sunday's 7–6 hard–fought win over Hofstra.

Boston College goalkeeper Anthony Cirri got shell– shocked early. When the smoke cleared UMass had already staked itself to a 5–0 first–quarter lead. Senior Mike DelPercio continued his recent offensive success, putting in three goals in the game, including the first one of the contest. Alex Racioppi, Mike McKeefrey, Mike Janowicz and Jeremy Guski followed suit as the game was out of reach early.

Jamie Heffernan put BC on the board early in the second quarter, but McKeefrey and Guski each added their second goals of the game to pull the Minutemen ahead 7–1.

BC's Kiernan O'Connor and Kevin McLane scored within seven seconds of each other to cut the Eagle deficit to 7–3 at halftime.

UMass jumped back out on offense right away in the third quarter. Freshman John Madigan, who was the hero on Sunday with the game–winner against Hofstra, netted goal No. 5 of his rookie campaign followed by another strike from DelPercio.

Mike Sullivan tried to keep the Eagles alive by scoring a goal to cut the UMass advantage to 9–4, but a rare long–stick goal by Chris Robbins and Racioppi's second of the game gave the Minutemen an 11–4 lead after three quarters. Racioppi's tally gave him the first multiple–goal game of his brief career.

The home team scored twice in the final quarter, while DelPercio completed his hat trick to send the Minutmen home victorious.

The Eagles were glad that yesterday marked the final time they have to face UMass goalkeeper John Kasselakis. He made 12 saves yesterday and in his three years as a starter, Boston College has only been able to get 20 shots past him.

UMass improved to 5–0 with the win, while the Eagles fell to 0–5. The Minutemen's 5–0 start marks the programs best start since 1987, when Dick Garber's club opened its campaign 6–0 en route to an 8–3 season which included a trip to the NCAA Tournament.

Massachusetts will attempt to defend its prefect record on Saturday, when the Black Knights of Army come to Richard F. Garber Field at 2 p.m.

Minuteman Notes: After five games, UMass has three players — DelPercio, Janowicz and McKeefrey — with at least one point in every game. Janowicz and DelPercio have at least one goal in each contest... UMass has now held regular season opponents under 10 goals in nine straight games dating back to the Minutemen's 11–8 loss to Loyola on April 12, 1997... Robbins' goal marked the first UMass goal by a long–stick player since Harold Drumm scored one against Virginia on March 16, last year.

UMass finishes at 13–7 after West Coast meets

By Sanford Appell
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts men's gymnastics team closed out the regular season at 13–7 after a moderately successful West Coast swing.

UMass started the trip off in disappointing fashion, placing third at Cal–Berkeley in a four–team meet. The Minutemen gained 220.55 points at this event, well below California's winning tally of 229.45.

Junior Stephen Pryor and sophomore Jeff LaValle led the Minutemen at this competition by finishing with the fourth and sixth best overall scores respectively.

Pryor finished fourth on parallel bars with a 9.3 and landed seventh on vault at 9.4.

LaValle placed second on floor exercise with a career–high 9.75. He also tied for fourth on vault with a 9.45 and placed fifth on rings with a 9.55.

"There were some strong individual performances from our guys," Massachusetts coach Roy Johnson said. "However, overall the team was somewhat tired, as we certainly came out stronger for the second meet of the trip."

Indeed, the results were more impressive at Stanford last Friday night, as the Minutemen placed ahead of the 1995 National Champion Cardinal squad.

UMass gained second place at the four–team meet with a 222.625 total. Cal–Berkeley once again triumphed with a 226.25. Stanford and Army rounded out the competition.

LaValle placed second overall with a 55.05 to lead UMass. He won the rings event with a 9.65.

Pryor chipped in with a sec.

Mike Plourde and the Massachusetts men's gymnastics team rounded out their regular season with a school–record 13 wins.

ond place finish on the parallel bars with a 9.7.

Looking ahead, the Minutemen have their work cut out for them heading into the postseason.

"We need a score of 228 at the ECAC Championships to have a shot at the regionals," Johnson said. "Anything else will probably not get it done, and the team really wants to keep competing."

While two victories would have really completed the West Coast excursion, the team returned home with their heads held high.

"We did not win the meets, but we can say we beat a team like Stanford, which has a great gymnastics program," junior Phil Leiberman said. "We need to prepare for the ECACs and get as high a score as possible."

As it stands, the Minutemen have already gained a new team record of 13 wins, besting the previous high of 10 set in the 1992–93 campaign.

Women's lax visits No. 14 Yale

By Jamie Jee
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts women's lacrosse team will try to extend its winning ways today when it travels to New Haven, Conn. to face the No. 14 Yale Bulldogs in a battle of unbeatens.

UMass (2–0) is coming off back–to–back wins against Ivy League opponent Harvard and Holy Cross, its first two games of the year.

The Minutewomen have played especially well as a team thus far, spreading the ball around nicely and finding the open player. Leading the way has been the youth–experience tandem of freshman attack Fay Naber and senior attack Jen Bowen. Naber currently sits atop the team goal list with six, with junior attack Laura Korutz following at five and Bowen at four.

Bowen scored the game–winning goal against Harvard in the season opener to give UMass the win in double overtime, and also scored three goals in the win over Holy Cross. Naber came through with four scores against Harvard, two of which came at the end of the second half to spur the Minutewomen from three goals down to three ahead.

Yale (2–0) will test the Minutewoman defense, as it has scored 28 goals in its first two matches of the season. The Bulldogs have been led by junior midfielder Alyssa Chen and sophomore attack Heather Bentley, who have 18 of those goals. Each scored five in Yale's opener, a 13–7 win over host Hofstra. Also effective has been the Bulldogs' set– up woman, Erin Porta, who has dished out a total of five assists.

UMass goalkeeper Jen Nardi has played well in net thus far, and holds a 0.569 save percentage with a 7.48 goals against average. She turned away 13 shots against Harvard and eight against Holy Cross, but will need help to contain Yale's flashy scorers. UMass will have to be wary of its susceptibility to the standouts, as Ali Harper of Harvard rung the Minutewomen up with seven scores and Holy Cross' Jen Amendola scored three of the Crusaders' four in the losing effort.

The Bulldogs last match was also against Holy Cross, as they came away with a resounding 15–3 stifling of the Crusaders. Chen and Bentley accounted for over half of those tallies, with eight total.

The team will also work on distracting Yale from its game plan, which will focus primarily on the triple threat of Chen, Bentley and Porta. Key for UMass will be putting the Bulldogs away early and not letting them hang around like the Crimson did.

"Against Harvard we were up two different times, and we should have been able to put them out," coach Francesca McClellen said. "One of our goals against Holy Cross was if we got a lead to keep it, and I think we did that well."

What has been working well for UMass has been early period scoring. The Minutewomen have scored the first goal in each contest, and have enjoyed dominating early.

McClellan will have the opportunity of facing her old team, having served as coach at Yale from 1986–92. The two time Ivy League Player of the Year led the resurgence of the Bulldogs' program, similar to that which the Minutewomen have enjoyed thus far.

Shakespearean deed held from auction

LONDON — Britain won't let a rare Shakespearean document leave the country just yet — a move aimed at allowing British buyers a chance to raise the money to purchase it.

Arts Minister Mark Fisher announced yesterday that the export license will be delayed for a 1602 deed of purchase for 107 acres of land the playwright bought in his hometown of Stratford. "As Shakespeare was the most influential writer this country has ever produced, any biographical documentation is of immense importance," he said in a statement.

The deed is known as the Warwick Shakespeare Deed because it has been in the possession of the Earls of Warwick since the 19th century.

The present earl put it up for sale in December at Sotheby's auction house, but no one met the minimum asking price of $417,500. An unidentified prospective foreign buyer apparently is seeking to take the deed out of the country. The government statement said a decision on an export license had been deferred until at least May 25 to allow public institutions in Britain to try to raise the latest price — $226,890.

High school suspends senior for Pepsi t-shirt

EVANS, Ga. (AP) — If your high school guidance counselor was right and there is such a thing as "your permanent record," this is going on Mike Cameron's: In 1998, he was suspended for wearing a Pepsi shirt on Coke Day.

School officials say the shirt was an insult to visiting Coca-Cola executives and ruined a school picture in which students spelled out "Coke."

Cameron says it was just a joke.

"In my eyes, I didn't do anything wrong," the 19-year-old senior said yesterday while serving his one-day suspension. "I know it sounds bad — 'Child suspended for wearing Pepsi shirt on Coke Day,'" said Gloria Hamilton, principal of Greenbrier High School in Evans, about 130 miles east of Atlanta, the world headquarters of Coca-Cola.

"It really would have been acceptable if it had just been in-house, but we had the regional president here and people flew in from Atlanta to do us the honor of being resource speakers. These students knew we had guests."

Friday's Coke in Education Day was part of Greenbrier's effort to win a $500 local contest run by the Coca-Cola Bottling Co. of Augusta and a national contest with a $10,000 prize.

Cameron wore a blue-and-white-striped shirt with a small Pepsi logo underneath another shirt. He waited until just before the picture was taken to remove his outer shirt, Mrs. Hamilton said.

SGA obtains legal advice

Counsel DiMare assists Senate with election problems

By Jill Carroll
Collegian Staff

Due to confusion concerning the March 9–10 University of Massachusetts Student Government Association (SGA) elections, the majority of last night's senate meeting was spent answering questions and identifying options to fill the currently vacant positions.

Special Counsel to the SGA and Director of Student Legal Services Charles DiMare came to the meeting to answer questions from the senate and advise potential actions to avoid a "constitutional crisis."

"If you believe that even 10 percent of the allegations [of misconduct during the elections] are provable than it is likely some authority will overturn these elections at sometime," DiMare said. "It's in the best interest of the elections [to not be ratified] right now or face a serious constitutional crisis."

A report from the elections commission was not given to the speaker's office within 48 hours after the election. The senate can not vote to ratify or annul the elections without receiving this report. The SGA constitution does not outline the action to be taken in this situation.

The elections currently have not been nullified or ratified. The option of holding new elections was preferred over using the chain of command to fill the positions of president and student trustee.

"In my opinion the constitution calls for a popularly elected president and the speaker [filling the position] is not popularly elected," DiMare said.

The SGA constitution states all elections must be finished by March 25. If the senate was to hold new elections after this date the elections would be easily nullified as unconstitutional.

DiMare recommends getting the Board of Trustees approval to make an exception to the constitution in this one case to enable new elections to be held after March 25.

"It is highly possible they [Board of Trustees] would give that authority. If you get the Trustees' authority then there will be no question," DiMare said.

DiMare said new elections could be held this semester.

"It could be possible to have elections in April or early May," DiMare said. "It's the only conservative approach."

DiMare encouraged getting approval from the Board of Trustees as soon as possible to set in motion elections that would take place this semester.

"Vote immediately right now to nullify and to hold new elections and allow Trustee Tirrell to get the necessary authority needed to make it happen," DiMare said.

Senator Paul Ferro asked if it was within the power of the senate to ratify the elections.

"Absolutely," DiMare said.

However Speaker Peter Kilbourne pointed out problems caused by ratifying the elections without regard to the complaints that have been registered.

Kilbourne asked what might happen if a student who was denied a vote brought a suit against the SGA.

"I think they would win. If 10 people stood up and said I couldn't vote because there weren't any absentee ballots that would be overwhelming evidence if it is believed," DiMare said.

Senator Dan Backer (Commuter at–large) proposed ratifying the elections then having the student judiciary decide if the complaint petitions would nullify the elections.

"It's an option. But it's the exact opposite of what I'm trying to do," DiMare said.

Kilbourne asked if the time constraints for elections were the same for student trustee as president.

"No. [The trustee] must be elected before May 1 or else after September 15," DiMare said.

No action was taken by the senate based on DiMare's advice. The decision will be made at the SGA meeting next week.

Greece will help Cyprus in defense

By Goerge Gedda
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Greece will defend Cyprus if Turkey follows through on a threat to destroy surface-to-air missiles that Cyprus plans to deploy this year, Greek Foreign Minister Theodore Pangalos said yesterday.

Pangalos said Turkey, a NATO ally, should not be alarmed by the proposed deployment because the missiles are defensive and will not alter Turkey's supremacy in the skies over the eastern Mediterranean Sea.

If Cypriot forces were to respond with the Russian-made missiles to a Turkish attack, the bulk of the Turkish air force would be spared even if the SAM firings had a 100 percent success rate, Pangalos said. Warheads in Cyprus' prospective SAM arsenal would number fewer than one-third as many as Turkey's "supermodern" fighters, he said.

"The missiles don't change the equilibrium," Pangalos said, expressing frustration over the U.S. policy of opposing the Cypriot missile deployment.

Pangalos spent almost an hour meeting with American reporters, during which he sprinkled his remarks with anti-Turkish sentiments. He left yesterday for Chicago after a five-day stay that included discussions with administration officials, members of Congress and private research groups.

Underscoring Turkey's military advantage, Pangalos pointed out that the proximity of Cyprus to Turkey relative to Greece means that Turkish planes could engage in hostile action over Cyprus for a considerably longer period than Greek fighters before running short of fuel.

For a Greek-Turkish balance to be achieved, Greece would need "five planes for every Turkish plane," Pangalos said.

Senate discusses funding legislation

By Alan Fram
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Legislation providing billions for the International Monetary Fund, U.S. troops abroad and El Nino damage at home is moving steadily through the Senate. But the House version is prompting sharp objections from Democrats, with Senate Democratic leader Tom Daschle yesterday calling a veto likely.

The Senate resumed debate yesterday on a bill that would provide more than $3 billion for American soldiers in Bosnia and the Persian Gulf and to help California, New England and other states rebuild from the winter's brutal storms. Another $1.9 billion in fresh requests for disaster assistance seemed likely to be added. It debated briefly an amendment by Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison, (R-Texas,) to set up conditions for a U.S. withdrawal of troops from Bosnia — but she withdrew the amendment before a vote, suggesting she just wanted to make a point.

A separate Senate package of $17.9 billion in loan guarantees for the IMF, whose coffers have been drained by the Asian financial crisis, had new momentum as the Clinton administration and Republicans seemed near agreement on conditions that would be imposed on the money.

Aides said the Senate might combine all the funds into a single bill and approve it today.

On Tuesday, the House Appropriations Committee approved two separate bills. It used a voice vote to pass one with the IMF money plus $505 million to pay back dues owed the United Nations. And by a party-line 29-21 roll call vote, the committee passed another measure with $2.9 billion for the disas-

King case questioned

Scott–King wants death re–investigated

By Russ Bynum

ATLANTA — The widow of Martin Luther King Jr. wants an investigation into possible new evidence that her husband's assassination was part of a conspiracy. But a prosecutor said today that records do not back up the account of the man who produced the evidence.

A former FBI agent came forward Tuesday to say he has papers that could help verify claims by James Earl Ray that a shadowy gunman named Raoul set him up to take the blame for killing King in 1968.

"This is compelling evidence that further strengthens Mr. Ray's appeal for the trial he never had," Coretta Scott King said in a statement.

"I call for a thorough investigation to help bring about at least some sense of closure to the pain my family and the American people have endured over unanswered questions surrounding this tragedy."

Donald Wilson, who worked in the FBI's Atlanta office when King was slain, said Tuesday he took papers from Ray's car when he impounded it from an Atlanta housing project six days after King was killed in Memphis, Tenn.

Today, The Commercial Appeal of Memphis reported that FBI records do not show Wilson as being among the five agents assigned to examine Ray's car.

"There was no Don Wilson that I heard of," said Carl E. Claiborne, 81, a retired FBI agent identified as the agent in charge of the car search.

Claiborne told The Commercial Appeal the car was searched in a locked basement and that only he and another former agent inspect-

JONESBORO, Ark. — A 13-year-old boy warned friends "he had a lot of killing to do" after he was jilted by a girl. A day later, police said, he and his 11-year-old cousin lured classmates out of school with a false fire alarm, then mowed them down with gunfire.

Four girls and an English teacher who shielded a student from the attack were killed in the ambush Tuesday. Eleven others — 10 students and a teacher — were wounded. Six people remained hospitalized today, one in critical condition.

Hearings for the boys were scheduled for today, while authorities searched for answers to how the boys got their weapons and why they attacked. Both parents of one of the boys are postmasters, and his father is listed as a gun club officer. "There's no explanation in my opinion why an 11-year-old or 13-year-old would do something like this," Craighead County Sheriff Dale Haas said. "It breaks my heart."

This morning, one big wreath, two bouquets and a candle was on the sidewalk in front of Westside Middle School. Classes were canceled.

Police did not offer a motive, but classmates said the 13-year-old had recently broken up with his girlfriend. A day earlier, he said he "had a lot of killing to do," schoolmate Jamie Clevenger told The Jonesboro Sun.

Another student said she saw the 11-year-old by the fire alarm, then saw him running out of the school once it was triggered. Authorities said up to 27 shots were fired. Youngsters scrambled as some of their bloodied classmates fell and cried as they awaited emergency workers.

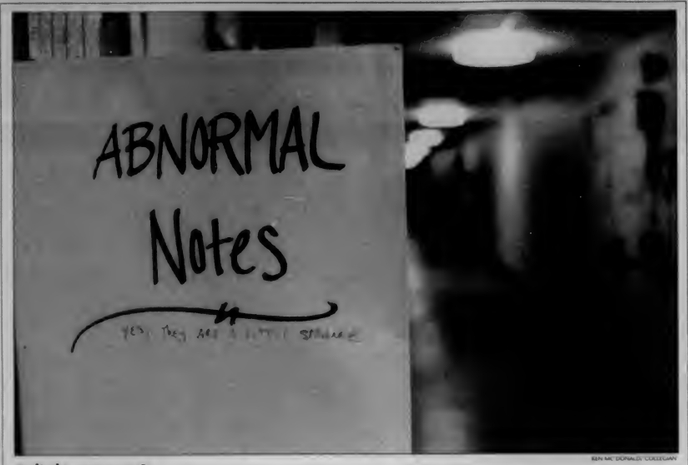
Killed were Natalie Brooks, Paige Ann Herring and Stephanie Johnson, all 12, and Brittany R. Varner, 11. Shannon Wright, 32, died Tuesday night after surgery for wounds to her chest and abdomen. Students said she stepped in front of a sixth-grader as the shots rang out. The student was not hurt.

Mrs. Wright, the mother of a 2 1/2-year-old son, was kind and loving, said Lula Belle Jones, the school's cafeteria manager. Asked about stepping in front of the bullet, Ms. Jones said: "She would do that without a doubt."

Authorities didn't release the boys' names, but the Sun identified them as Mitchell Johnson, 13, and his 11-year-old cousin Andrew Golden. Under state law, children under age 14 are charged only in Juvenile Court. They may be held until they are 21, but usually are turned out of the system by 18 because of a lack of facilities.

Prosecutor Brent Davis said today his office would charge the boys with five counts of capital murder in Juvenile Court. However, state Attorney General Winston Bryant said earlier that a defendant must be 14 to be eligible for the death sentence.

In Little Rock, U.S. Attorney Paula Casey said her office was looking into whether it could charge the 13-year-old with federal firearms violations, though it was likely the 11-year-old would be off-limits.



Golden's father, Dennis, is postmaster at Biggers, Ark., about 40 miles north; his mother, Patricia, is postmistress at Walnut Ridge, postal workers said. In state corporation records, Dennis Golden also is listed as an officer for a gun club, the Jonesboro Practical Pistol Shooters.

Students described Mitchell as a troubled boy who had recently begun bragging about involvement with a gang and was upset over a breakup with a girlfriend, who was among the wounded. Students said he made numerous threats Monday.

"He told us that tomorrow you will find out if you live or die," seventh-grader Melinda Henson, who described herself as a good friend of the boy, told the Sun.

"He told me yesterday that all the people who broke up with him, you know, he's going to come to school tomorrow and shoot them," said 12-year-old Charles Vanoven, another seventh-grader. "I thought he was just kidding around."

Charles said the 13-year-old also pulled a knife on another student Monday, but he was afraid to report him. Other students said the boy was specifically targeting one of the girls wounded. "He said he was definitely going to shoot Candace because she had broken up with him," sixth-grader Kara Tate, 11, told the Sun. Kim Candace Porter, identified by several students as the former girlfriend, was listed in stable condition at St. Bernards Regional Medical Center.

ters and troops.

To pay for the disaster measure, the committee approved $2.9 billion in cuts to low-income housing, airport projects, bilingual education and President Clinton's pet Americorps national service program. The Republican-proposed reductions were approved in a 33-26 party-line vote.

House Speaker Newt Gingrich defended the decision to cut domestic programs, and responded to White House opposition by questioning whether the Clinton administration wants a balanced budget.

"I don't understand, as the president goes through Africa giving away money, why the White House is opposed to a balanced budget," Gingrich, (R-Ga.), said in a brief interview today. Gingrich also predicted there would be enough votes to push the measure through the House next week, despite solid Democratic opposition.

"We're serious about dealing with what are very serious issues," said Rep. Bob Livingston, (R-La.), chairman of the appropriations panel.

Both bills were due to hit the House floor next week. But using overtones of last year's veto battle over aid to the flooded Midwest — a fight between President Clinton and Republicans in which the public mostly blamed the GOP — the White House was already pouncing.

Daschle told reporters today that efforts in the House to try to pay for the disaster aid and for military operations with reductions in domestic programs was a "non starter."

"The president will be forced to veto the legislation" if it reaches his desk in such a form, Daschle said.

The White House has expressed similar reservations.

"It would be disappointing and disturbing if our ability to provide assistance to victims of natural disasters and out troops in Bosnia and Iraq were held hostage to partisan politics in the House," White House Chief of Staff Erskine Bowles said in a statement.

Last year's veto fight over the flood bill focused on Republican provisions dealing with census techniques and preventing future federal shutdowns. But Tuesday, administration officials said they had two chief objections to this year's House legislation. They opposed the $2.9 billion in program cuts, and they said conditions the House GOP would clamp on the IMF money — restricting the way it issues loans to ailing countries — are too harsh. Warning that the administration would "vigorously oppose" domestic cuts, White House budget director Franklin Raines wrote to House leaders, "I urge you not to take actions that could result in gridlock and that would be detrimental both to our troops abroad and to our citizens at home at their time of need."

And in a separate letter to lawmakers, Treasury Secretary Robert Rubin wrote of "very serious concerns" he had with some GOP conditions for the IMF funds.

Students, police clash in Solo

Indonesian students protest Suharto's failure to reverse currency

By Geoff Spencer
Associated Press

JAKARTA, Indonesia — Police and soldiers used sticks and clubs today to beat back rock-throwing students who tried to carry an anti-government demonstration beyond the confines of their university. At least 49 people were injured, witnesses said. The fighting in Solo, 250 miles east of Jakarta, broke out hours after the United States announced it would send $56 million in food and medical aid to ease the suffering of millions of Indonesians impoverished by their worst economic crisis in 30 years.

The clash was the most violent in a monthlong series of campus protests over President Suharto's failure to reverse a devastating plunge in the value of Indonesia's currency.

Now in his 33rd year of power, Suharto, 76, has sharply reined in dissent, arresting opponents and banning critical books and magazines.

The government is taking the same tack with the students, warning them to stay on university grounds and blocking them with anti-riot police when they stray onto main roads.

Today 300 police and troops used sticks and clubs to beat back some of the roughly 1,000 students who took part in the anti-government protest at Solo's March 11 University. At least 10 security personnel and 39 protesters were injured, witnesses said. "We tried to prevent them from marching into the street," said police chief Lt. Col. Imam Suwangsa. He said 10 policemen were injured by stones.

Communist leader noncommittal after meeting Russia's acting premier

By Vladimir Isachenkov
Associated Press

MOSCOW — Russia's new acting prime minister conferred yesterday with major opposition politicians, whose support he will need if President Boris Yeltsin nominates him for a permanent stint as premier.

Sergei Kiriyenko's meetings included discussions with Communist Party leader Gennady Zyuganov, who heads a coalition of Yeltsin opponents in parliament's lower house, the State Duma. The Duma must approve Yeltsin's candidate for prime minister, and winning Zyuganov's support will be crucial.

After an hour with Kiriyenko, Zyuganov was noncommittal about the 35-year-old former oil minister.

"We cannot make any immediate conclusions," he said. "He does not have full information, does not know the real situation in any field except the one he was dealing with."

Duma speaker Gennady Seleznov, a Communist, voiced doubt about Kiriyenko's chances for approval. "He also lacks economic experience that would enable him to be in charge of the huge Russian economy," Seleznyov said, according to the Interfax news agency. Yeltsin spoke with Seleznov by telephone yesterday. No details of their talk were immediately available.

Yeltsin's spokesman said the president was grateful to his countrymen for remaining calm during the government shakeup. "The president counted on society responding to his decision to fire the Cabinet just the way they did, with interest,understanding and calmness," spokesman Sergei Yastrzhembsky told the ITAR-Tass news agency.

On Monday, Yeltsin fired Prime Minister Viktor Chernomyrdin and his entire administration, saying Russian needs a more dynamic leadership team to revive the economy and protect democratic reforms.

However, Yeltsin has made it clear that not all members of his former Cabinet will have to clean out their desks, indicating that some key ministers, like Foreign Minister Yevgeny Primakov and Defense Minister Igor Sergeyev, are expected to be back.

John Campbell, chief prosecutor on the case in Memphis, confirmed today that the FBI records on the car search don't mention Wilson. Campbell, who has worked on the case for about four years, said records do confirm that a Donald Wilson worked for the FBI in Atlanta and that Wilson did handle some aspects of the King investigation, unrelated to the car.

Wilson insisted he has the documents and said he wants to show them to U.S. Attorney General Janet Reno. He would not say why he withheld the papers from his FBI superiors, but The Journal-Constitution said Tuesday that Wilson said he did not pass the documents to his superiors in 1968 because he did not believe they were conducting a serious investigation and did not trust them.

Wilson said he found an envelope containing two pieces of paper with the name "Raul" written on them.

Ray pleaded guilty to killing King in 1969 and was sentenced to 99 years in prison, but later recanted and has been seeking a trial ever since. He is gravely ill with chronic liver disease.

Jesus Christ Superstar
A heart-stopping rendition of the Andrew Lloyd Webber rock opera.

The Messiah is coming! The UMass Theatre Guild's spring musical Jesus Christ Superstar hits Bowker Auditorium March 25-28. With a fresh twist on the popular A. L. Webber rock opera and with the talents of Five-College students, the Guild presents yet another extravaganza of singing, dancing and jubilance.

The director, senior Tim Fisk, has steered the musical away from it's preconceived roots in the barren lands of Israel, and set the rock opera in a Las Vegas-like casino, appropriatly dubbed, the Hosanna Cabana. But don't be fooled by the glittering lights and fabulous characters. "This is a story about love, intimacy, and poignant human need that is not fulfilled in this world," Fisk said. "It's a tragedy about the loss of an enlightened one. It tells the audience as to show that it's not too late to embrace one another."

The curtain goes up Wednesday, March 25th at Bowker Auditorium and runs through the 28th. There is a Saturday Matinee at 2:00pm, followed by a talk-back session with the cast and artistic team. The Final evening performance will be on the 28th.

Tickets are $5 for UMass Students, and $7 general admission. tickets can be purchased at the Fine Arts Center Box Office, or call 545-2511

On pot & legalization

Mike Messaros

The problem with telling someone what they can and can't do is that tomorrow, you could be on the other side of the fence, being told that what you're doing is wrong. So I'm going to try not to do that. While I do not support the use of marijuana, in fact, I hate marijuana, I do feel that there are holes in the argument that it should be banned. While there is proof, despite what pro-marijuana supporters say, that the use of the drug does have negative effects and can lead to worse things, that same argument could be used for alcohol.

So while I must say from the heart that I am not for the legalization of marijuana, my mind tells me that there are too many good counter-arguments for me to support an all- out ban. I'll ride the fence on this one. Don't like the smell; don't like dealing with people who smoke up, but these are personal reasons. This isn't a tyranny of Mike (although it should be — I know the score).

That being said, I think that the pro-marijuana supporters are treading on dangerous ground by throwing such weight behind Proposition 215. This proposition was passed on Nov. 7, 1996 in the state of California after being put to a state-wide vote. It legalized the medicinal use of marijuana for patients with a note from their doctor. Marijuana has been shown to relieve many of the symptoms of glaucoma, and provides relief for sufferers of cancer, AIDS and other afflictions.

The law has come under fire recently from the federal government because of people like Dennis Peron. Peron owns a "cannabis club" in San Francisco, and this club was founded under the pretense that it would distribute medicinal marijuana to patients. But it has been charged that Peron has used his club to sell marijuana to people a little less needy than AIDS patients. It has become a hot selling location for the drug in the city.

This leads me to doubt the sincerity of many of the supporters of the proposition. Their actions come off as less than altruistic. To support the legalization of pot is one thing, to hide behind the auspices of helping the sick is another. It taints the cause. To be seen supporting this, to look like you're using the sick to win favor for your own cause, can only make you look bad in the end. To quote Homer Simpson, "I'm not one for these back door shenanigans." Hey — no one likes back door shenanigans. It only makes you look bad in the eyes of the "silent majority." To watch the news reports and see people in tied-dyed t- shirts and hemp jewelry, it doesn't seem as if they're acting without a bit of self-interest. Not that acting in one's own self-interest is intrinsically wrong — but to use the sick as a human shield? Not very good.

So here's the thing: stop being silly about it. Stop the stupid rallies in the town common, stop being duplicitous in your support for certain laws and bills. Don't put out dumb pamphlets with quotes from source saying that pot is the greatest thing around — it just comes off as rationalization. It hurts me to say it, but just ask for legalization. Point out that it's silly to demonize the drug when everything that is wrong with pot is wrong with alcohol, a perfectly legal drug. The only way to be taken seriously is to cut to the point, skip steps one and three. And don't, I mean don't let Woody Harrelson be your spokesman. That guy is a little off-kilter. He's one step above Wavy Gravy.

To support the legalization of pot is one thing, to hide behind the auspices of helping the sick is another.

And why do I say all this, when I am no big fan of the drug? Because I know that by supporting this, I support my own rights. Yup, now I'm being selfish. But I can imagine what the world would be like if they made it illegal to play NHL '98 on Sony.

I shudder at the thought.

New Cuba policy not enough

This past week, the Clinton administration altered its policy of economic sanctions against Fidel Castro's Cuba just a bit, allowing Cubans living in the United States to send money to relatives on the island nation. The administration also will allow more charter flights to Cuba, will ease restrictions on exporting medicines and will work with Congress to send more humanitarian aid to its long-time American adversary.

Those changes in policy may seem to represent a loosening of the iron fist that the United States has clasped around the Cuban state since Castro came to power in 1959. This week's changes stand in line with traditional policy to hamper the Castro regime with economic sanctions while claiming, as a 1997 State Department document noted, to support an "outreach to the Cuban people."

The moves last week follow that desire to appeal to the Cuban people in the wake of a changing social atmosphere brought about by the visit of Pope John Paul II. The population not only seemed to rediscover its Catholic roots, but saw for the first time in decades an alternative to the Castro regime for its philosophical needs. Cubans are emphasizing something other than government intervention in their lives, and the Clinton administration has now decided to pursue outreach more than entrenchment.

Despite this new-found leniency, American policy on Cuba remains contradictory. Our nation apparently sees itself reaching out to a population that has seen its economy ravaged by the affects of a 39-year-old economic embargo — an idea that confounds the mind. Even last week's policy changes will not have much effect on the living conditions of Cubans, who struggle to pay black market prices for many rudimentary goods.

The group Americans for Humanitarian Trade reports that it costs four times more to send medical supplies to Cuba — a cost passed along to consumers — due to the embargo. The current easing of restrictions changes nothing related to the embargo, a fact that the State

Chris Nehls

Department's own spokesmen noted this past week at a press conference. Allowing Cuban-Americans to send relatives money only simplifies a process they have engaged in for years via third parties. Any humanitarian aid, however, hardly offsets the further damage created by the Helms-Burton Act, which extends the embargo's impact by punishing foreign firms that deal with Cuba.

United States policy towards Cuba since Castro's takeover always has centered upon democratic change for the nation. This has moved from clandestine operations like the Bay of Pigs invasion of 1961 to sitting behind the economic embargo and waiting for Cubans to get hungry enough to take up arms themselves. Now that Cuba's aid from the Eastern Block has evaporated, the embargo has decimated the Cuban economy as much as any Castro economic policy. Furthermore, sanctions only succeed in bleeding the middle class of Cuba dry while the ruling elite entrench themselves through corruption. Anyone who studies the revolution for very long will tell you that the middle classes, specifically the urban bourgeoisie, are the revolutionary classes in any society. They are the people to whom the United States "reaches out," and yet they are incapacitated by America's embargo policy.

Never mind what the policy has done to the poor of Cuba. With a negative economic growth rate since 1995, Cubans now face food and medical shortages in a nation once revered as having one of the finest health care systems in Latin America. All the Cubans know of America is that it is the nation that keeps them in abject poverty while proclaiming itself the guardian of freedom in the hemisphere.

The belief that anything that damages the Cuban economy diminishes Castro's grip on power remains an antiquated and baseless policy. It only has led to undue suffering by the Cuban people and the elimination of the middle class as a potential challenger of power. The lesson economic sanctions taught America in Haiti, where the rich only got richer by hoarding embargoed goods while the masses starved, have gone unheeded in Haiti's Caribbean neighbor.

To really hit Castro, the United States should foster a relationship with the Cuban middle class by lifting the trade embargo once and for all. Starving a people with no real means of supporting a revolution on their own is a cruel and paradoxical policy. Castro will fall, but only if we help the Cuban people, who now have tasted freedom with the pope's visit, in their endeavors.

Hip hop hooray

Luke Meredith

Keep in mind I was really, really sleepy when I came up with this one.

It's 8:26 a.m. yesterday. I'm riding the PVTA, because I have my French mid-term (which, of course, I would eventually bomb). This kid gets on the bus (which, of course, happens a lot these days) and starts rapping.

Rapping. At 8:26 a.m.

This kid, who by his age I'm assuming is a college student, just sits down and busts out like he it was a 1988 taping of "Yo! MTV Raps," and he was Fab 5 Freddy. In my sleepy haze— at 8:26 a.m.— I caught the following lines.

"Educate, conversate, regulate, I don't use bait, when I fish, dish, I wish I was a fish... educate y'all".

Or something like that (I might have missed a few verses).

At first, I'm like "What the hell is this kid's problem? Who raps on PVTA buses? Before noon?"

I mean really, get a hold of yourself there, "Fishmaster B."

But then I start thinking, "What if this kid is the next Easy E, and he just gave us all a free concert? What if the fish thing is what all the kids are rapping about?"

Then we'd all be sorry.

Then I start to wonder if I could rap, because it's 8:26 in the morning and I'm heading into a mid-term that is about to kick my ass, and I'm not even sure I'm awake yet.

And dammit, sometimes rap makes you happy.

I'm thinking I could write a whole rap album by noon. Not that rap albums are easy, but mine would be "wack," so it wouldn't matter.

Or would it?

First, it needs a name. I figure I could call it either Gettin' Dookie Wit It or Puff Daddy ain't my Daddy.

Because he ain't, you know.

I'm going with Getting Dookie Wit It, because frankly, Will Smith rocks from South Street to I–2–fifth.

Alright, there we go.

Next thing to do would be to go to the mall and buy a red Yankees hat. Don't know why Yankee hats come in 37 colors now, (must be George Constanza's fault) but I think it's in the Hip-Hop Rule Book that you have to have at least four of them. You'd probably find it in the chapter about why Vanilla Ice's Miami hat was wrong, but why Chuck D's Phillies hat in Welcome to the Terrordome was so, so right.

Now if I learned anything from N.W.A. (oh, and I did), it's that you should rap about what you know. I could do that.

My first song would be about Maggie Seaver, because she's so hot. I know about that.

Believe me.

"Maggie, Maggie, looks good in a baggie, pants are never saggy, yells at Mike because his jeans are raggy... You are so fine, Maggie."

I could write a song about Housemate A. In fact, I could write an album about Housemate A.

But we won't go there.

"Housemate A... ho, hey, ho, hey... Housemate A... ho, hey, ho... you wrote a column about a pin but you didn't look my way, hey,... you drank a beer 'cause it was good as a baker, 'cause your A by nature, not 'cause you hate ya."

Housemate A. Ho, hey.

If Chuck D taught me anything (oh, and he did), it's that you have to address social issues in your hood. I can do that.

"I live in Mill Valley, 'cause I ain't a sally. Life is hard, but I don't need a bodyguard."

I once saw three 15–year–olds walking around "The Val" after 10 p.m. None of them had done their homework.

And you say Compton is scary.

I could have guest stars, like P.J., and his smash hit "Hey Luke, Get a Job," which goes like this:

"Hey Luke, get a job. Hey Luke, get a job. Hey Luke, Luke, get a job, baby."

I bet P.J. thinks that one will sell like wildfire, because it's all he's been saying lately.

My tour would be a mild success, I bet. I'm hoping I could open up for Puff Daddy and the Family (featuring Lil' Kim, Mase, and P.J.) this summer, so I don't have to get a real job until September or so. I'm even thinking of playing a few warm-up dates, co–headlining with "Fishmaster B" on his "PVTA is Phat" 1998 tour. But believe me, none of those shows would start at 8:26 a.m.

That way, I know I'm awake for it.

Letters to the Editor

Who is SGA representing?

To the editor:

I would like to take this opportunity to publicly condemn some of the partisan politics that parasitically dwell within the Student Government Association (SGA).

The essence of this letter manifested itself during one of the side squabbles proceeding the last SGA meeting's adjournment. I was engaged in a fierce verbal confrontation with some of the proponents of the justice's appointment. I called them upon what I strongly felt was an unethical move. I affirmatively proclaimed that I felt the outcome of the election was what fueled their corrupt motives in denying the student body with highly competent leaders. The pinnacle of the confrontation occurred upon an ALANA appointed senator, Marielly Troncoso, turning around to me and stating, "It is time for you to look in the mirror and check your color and stop fronting."

I was appalled and taken aback. Yes, I am a person of color, but there are no words to describe the anguish, humiliation and hurt pride that descended upon me at that precise moment. I saw this as an attack on my personality. My characteristic traits were being condemned! I perceived this as an attack on the way I speak my diction, my mannerism, my values and the way I dress. I felt that since I did not fit into her persona of the average minority, I was considered a sellout.

I was dismayed that fellow a minority student could launch such bitter vindictive and malicious attacks against one who chooses to think for himself and goes against the grain. Against one who traveled along a different path in life prior to arriving at this University. A path that has led me to have an entirely different ideology when dealing with SGA related business. She for one knows practically nothing about my background. I am a senator who stands up for my principals and beliefs. I acquired my senate seat through the due process of democratic elections with the intent of furthering student causes on campus. I feel that I am accountable to the student population as a whole, particularly my constituents, and not a small (percentage wise) select group of people. I do not appreciate being expected to follow a behavioral pattern because of my race. I am not a robot that can be simply programmed at will, nor can I easily be corrupted by those bent on using me as a pawn to further their cause, nor am I a puppet. I will publicly state that I am not what is commonly referred to as an "Uncle Tom." (An Uncle Tom is a black individual that is perceived as trying to act Caucasian while disclaiming their ethnic culture and heritage.)

I feel that the type of mentality displayed by the ALANA appointed senator, Marielly Troncoso, is extremely detrimental towards the process of achieving a true sense of campus unity. This remark led me to strongly believe that she foolishly sees everything along the lines of color. I feel that you as members of the UMass community should publicly chastise and condemn such outrageous practices and behavior.

I will close by asking you if it is a crime to think for yourself or to do what you deem best for the student body as a whole?

GEO provides valuable services to graduate employees

To the editor:

Erin Shafer's encouragement to graduate employees to go out and vote in the Graduate Employee Organization (GEO) Contract Ratification vote (letters to the editor, 3/25) is to be welcomed, even if the tone of her letter is regrettable. We feel that we need to respond to some of the more contentious claims Shafer makes. First of all we emphatically reject her claim that GEO is after her paycheck. Her individual contract offers her a provision to opt-out of paying union dues — the employees, much to our regret, who do opt-out are not forced to pay what may reasonably be argued is their fair share. GEO is not responsible for payroll deduction errors, but we will be happy to explain how to rectify any problems.

Shafer does raise the important issue of agency fee, something GEO is consulting all its members over during the Contract ratification process. Under Massachusetts labor law, GEO is entitled to collect a service fee from graduate employees who choose not to be union members. This fee is used toward staffing, negotiating, servicing members and administering the new contract. This is a decision that GEO does not take lightly. All graduate employees are free to vote to reject the new contract, which includes the agency fee, but in so doing they will also reject the gains in the contract.

Every effort has been made to inform graduate employees of the agency provision, including two rounds of posting in departments, a direct mailing to all graduate employees and a full page spread in the latest issue of the Graduate Voice.

All other unions on campus collect an agency fee and the fee is a norm among Massachusetts public employee unions. GEO feels that agency fee is a necessity since the administration have chosen to cut GEO staff by half.

Additional funds will be helpful in hiring the staff necessary to prepare us for our new contract round, which begins in a year's time.

Shafer says that a worker's union for "graduate students" (we assume she means to say graduate employees) is "ridiculous." The unionization of teaching assistants may appear to be novel, but GEO/UAW is part of a growing nationwide movement to organize and unionize graduate employees that has, in many respects, been the cutting edge of the U.S. labor movement in the last decade. In some respects GEO was at the forefront of this: all the guaranteed benefits that graduate employees enjoy on campus are the result of GEO.

If Shafer wants her money back, will she also forego her free health-care, tuition and curriculum fee waivers, and the wage hike that is imminent for her? After all these must make her "giggle," in the way that the idea of GEO does.

We encourage all graduate student employees members to turn out and vote. Please read the posters on campus or the latest Graduate Voice newspaper, drop by the office, or come to the question and answer session between 4 and 5 p.m. in the Colonial Lounge to get more information. Ballot boxes will located in the Colonial Lounge today between 4 and 9 this evening.

Method to the madness

Exposed: the cult of "South Park"

It's as if Roald Dahl dropped an Ecstasy tablet and set a story in dysfunctional America.

Anyone who hasn't been locked up in cave this past year knows about "South Park," Comedy Central's show about "four lovable scamps." Simply put, it's the biggest cult hit on television since "The X–Files" went mainstream.

To the uninitiated, the show comes off as a new low in the realm of low–brow humor, even below MTV's "Beavis & Butt–head." But upon closer examination, "South Park" is much more than just a bunch of crass language and sophomoric humor.

The genius of the show is that it works on two levels. Viewers can take it as simple couch–potato toonery or look at what's happening below the surface, which is more often than not a hilarious — and poignant — social commentary on some of life's taboo subject matters, ranging from gun control to race relations to homosexuality.

When Cartman dressed up like Hitler, and then a KKK grand wizard for Halloween, it was nearly impossible not to see the humor in such an obvious social faux pas. Besides, no single group can really claim "South Park" offensive because no one on the show comes off rosy. Certainly not the down–on–his–luck Kenny, who has been killed in every show — save for a Christmas episode respite. Trying to figure out just what the hell he mutters under his hood is reason enough to watch every Wednesday night.

"South Park" is a fictitious small, now–bound community located in the Colorado Rockies, home to four 8–year olds, Stan, Kyle, Cartman and Kenny. The quartet is obsessed by bodily functions and what they perceive as sexual deviance. These character traits lead to lots of scatological banter. As the warning before every episode explains: "The following program contains coarse language and, due to its content, should not be viewed by anyone."

Needless to say, the kids are forever getting involved in strange happenings. In the opening episode, the fantastic foursome, animated with all the style and sophistication of Pac–Man (circa 1982), somewhat predictably encounter alien intruders who give Cartman an anal probe.

Other installments include the destruction of Barbra Streisand (by The Cure's Robert Smith no less) and Kathy Lee Gifford, Big Gay Al's Big Gay Animal Sanctuary and the unforgettable Mr. Hankey the Christmas Poo.

The creators of "South Park," Matt Stone and Trey Parker, are two twentysomething animators who resemble slightly earnest rock stars.

Turn to CHEESY POOFS, page 9

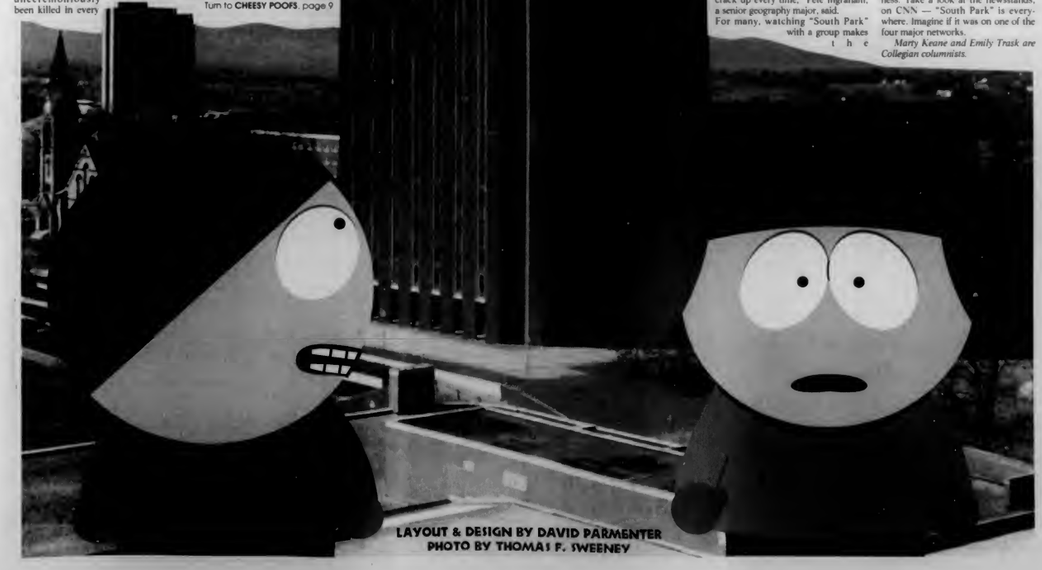
We all know the day (Wednesday), the time (10 p.m.), the channel (Comedy Central). "South Park" is without question the most popular show here at UMass, and it doesn't take an anal probe to figure it out.

Hordes gather in the Bluewall to watch it. Dorms fall silent. Fraternities use the show as a recruiting tool. Thursday morning classes are inevitably awash in pre–lecture chatter about Kenny's latest unfortunate demise and what new thing Cartman was bitching aimlessly about. In short, "South Park" has spawned a following so fervent that its fan–base is quickly becoming larger than Cartman's girth.

Since the first episode aired this past summer, Comedy Central's profile has gone from being the home to movies starring big name celebrities before they were famous and "Saturday Night Live" re–runs to one of cable's more formidable networks. Indeed, Comedy Central has even built "South Park" into a block of weekly comedy shows along with "The Tick" and "The Critic" every Sunday night. Another testament to the show's legs is the fact that the network shows the same "South Park" episode four times each week.



In fact, most fans at UMass freely admit to watching the show more than once a week. "I never miss it. No matter how many times I've seen them shoot Kathy Lee (Gifford), I still crack up every time," Pete Ingraham, a senior geography major, said. For many, watching "South Park" with a group makes the show's smarmy humor even more laugh–out–loud funny. According to senior English major Elana Mendelson, "Everyone in our house watches it. It's almost a communal experience."

Another component of "South Park" mania is the propensity viewers have for debating the merits of their favorite characters. While most seem to favor the loutish antics of Cartman, many are enthralled by the bit–players, much like "The Simpsons": Chef (voiced by the legendary soul singer Isaac Hayes), the flaky Mr. Garrison, Kyle's mom, Pip (the poor English chap who can't seem to buy a football helmet), and the idiotic Officer Barbrady among them. Still, "South Park" is much more over–the–top in its humor and a little too dangerous for mainstream consumption when compared to its adult cartoon counterparts.

Like "Beavis & Butt–head" and "The Simpsons" before it, "South Park" has moved en force into the malls and onto the streets of America by way of t–shirts, hats and stickers. The current wave of merchandising and the blitzkrieg of media coverage is little more than a passing fad to be sure, but who can argue with a bona–fide pop culture phenomenon.

One is hard pressed to walk to class every day and not see at least one t–shirt or other article of clothing emblazoned with a "South Park" likeness. Take a look at the newsstands, on CNN — "South Park" is everywhere. Imagine if it was on one of the four major networks.

Wild Things not so wild

Campy new flick little more than overgrown soft–core porn

WILD THINGS
Directed by John McNaughton with Matt Dillon, Kevin Bacon, Neve Campbell
Playing at Hampshire Six Theaters

It's good to see some old–fashioned campy evil in the movies every now and then, but Wild Things is too much of a good thing, if campy evil can be a good thing.

The movie takes place in an upperclass, South Florida community that seems to be drowning in sunlight. This is not a pristine, wholesome surface set up to be shattered. The high school is like the Playboy mansion with boating classes. A comparison with "Melrose Place" would make sense, except even "Melrose" doesn't devote five minutes to high school girls in white T–shirts washing a jeep in slo–mo. In another understated move, director John McNaughton cuts away from the characters to a shot of an alligator lurking in dark water approximately one million times. Likewise, he uses the same swampy song more often than VH–1 plays Celine Dion.

This movie is so black that the money, the prize every-one fights for, is more of an excuse to be evil than anything anyone cares about. The meat of the movie is an orgy of double crosses and plot twists so violent your neck gets sore from spinning around. The movie is so manipulative it verges on malice towards the audience. You can almost hear the director cackling in the background.

All this said, in spite of myself, I intermittently enjoyed Wild Things. Maybe I'm just dense, but I was fooled com-pletely several times, and I liked being fooled. It was also entertaining to watch the actors slumming. Bill Murray has his usual rumpled excellence. Neve Campbell and Kevin Bacon awkwardly jitter and slime through their respective roles. Denise Richards has excellent car washing skills and a good handle on dopey, selfish glee, despite the fact that she's about as subtle as a dumptruck. Matt Dillon effort-lessly holds all the murky crap together as the dim (or is he?) high school guidance counselor.

The movie does have lots of problems, the most major

Old Tap with an industrial twist

TAP DOGS
Fine Arts Center Concert Hall
March 24–25

Donning in jeans, flannel shirts and Blunstones — the Australian work boots — the six men who make up the dance company Tap Dogs tapped their way into the Fine Arts Center Concert Hall last night and Tuesday night to the delight of the audiences who packed the theater both nights.

As the crowds filed into the theater, the curtain stage was left open, revealing the industrial strength set on which the crew was still finishing some last minute details. The set consisted of a multi–tiered platform dec-orated with the image of a tread of a large work boot projected on to a large piece corrugated metal that was suspended from the ceiling.

As the lights went down, only the sound of a lone dancer filled the darkness. A solitary beam of light unveiled the mystery pair of feet. Performing intricate dance patterns, and with growing intensity, the single dancer disappeared, only to be replaced by five other pairs of tapping feet who were unveiled from behind the set.

Dein Perry, the creator of Tap Dogs, after having established his reputation as Australia's preeminent tap dancer, sought to create his own show inspired by his experience in the industrial world and his desire to bring more contemporary music to the stage.

Perry's genius shown through every step of the way, with the stage looking more like a construction site than a dance set, and the dancers seeming as if they were on a lunch break rather than performing dance routines for a packed house.

The entire show was a veritable rhythmic extravagan-za with a jazzy–techno–new age musical combination, as well as incorporation of the fold–out set and various power tools into their highly creative routines. The self–contained set was transformed numerous times

Titanic rules lengthy Oscar ceremony; "Damon," "Significant Others" debut

So where were you at about 1 a.m. Tuesday? I'm willing to bet that many people were sitting in front of a television watching the 70th Annual Titanic — I mean, Academy — Awards, waiting for the winner of the Best Picture.

The awards proved to be more entertaining this year, despite extending over four hours, and having to witness Titanic clean up. The producers of the awards show did an excellent job keep-ing the performances interesting, and mixing them with a fair amount of awards being present-ed to keep the audience glued.

Titanic walked away with Best Picture, Best Song, Best Score and Best Costumes, among oth-ers, on its way to winning a record 11 Oscars.

Best Actress went to Helen Hunt for As Good As It Gets. Her co–star in that film, Jack Nicholson, took Best Actor. Robin Williams won Best Supporting Actor for Good Will Hunting and Kim Basinger took the Oscar for her role as a prostitute in L.A. Confidential.

Aside from the drama of the record–setting Titanic sweep, per-haps one of the most dramatic scenes of the Academy Awards came when all of the previous Oscar award winning actors and actresses were honored for their achievements. However, I was dis-appointed with this portion of the show. Some of the past award win-ners did not show up for this honor, and no attempt at all to explain why these people were not there. For example, where was Tom Hanks? He won two consecu-tive Best Actor Oscars a very short time ago, and people remember him. Other Oscars winners who were missing included Nicholas Cage, Clint Eastwood and Meryl Streep.

In celebration of Titanic's win, FOX re–aired the behind the scenes look, Titanic at the James Cameron spectacle which was orig-inally aired over a month ago.

One of the biggest controversies about Oscar night, was whether or not Leonardo DiCaprio would attend. Movie fans were forced to wait till the night before to find out that he was not coming. He said the reason he did not attend was because he didn't want his personal fame to get in the way of the others in the cast and crew of the film. Awfully considerate of you, Leo.

Kudos also go to awards' host, Billy Crystal. Crystal chose to host the show even after he claimed that 1997 would be his last. Crystal's dry wit mixed with his knowledge of so many of the Hollywood names and faces make him an excellent host. I also enjoyed Crystal's reaction when one of his closest friends, Robin Williams, won an Oscar for best supporting actor in Good Will Hunting.

This Saturday afternoon, the sec-ond highest rated sporting event of the year hits the airwaves. That's right, it's "Final Four Saturday."

Utah, North Carolina, Stanford and Kentucky are all set to battle in what proves to be pizza deliv-ery's number one Saturday of the year. Ironically, the championship game which is played on Monday night never receives nearly as high a ranking as the semi–finals on Saturday.

FOX added many new shows to there line–up, the most predomi-nate and most advertised of these new shows are "Significant Others" and "Damon."

"Significant Others" showed to be an extreme disappoint-ment. This show has been hyped so much, is responsible for my sudden depression every Wednesday night at 9 p.m. since this new kid on the block took the time slot for four weeks of "Party of Five."

"Significant Others" lacks the charismatic and alluring actors and actresses on other shows like "Party of Five," "Melrose Place" and "Friends."

But "Damon" was a true sur-prise. In the past few years, many members of the cast of "In Living Color" have tried to make a name for themselves on televi-sion. Unfortunately, none of these attempts have come up with any-thing. "Damon" allowed Damon Wayans to act the way he does best. He was in control of the show at all times, and was a very likable character.

Did anyone catch the "Simpsons" this week? This past Sunday's episode involved my favorite, and the favorite character of the people that I usually watch the show with, Ralph Wigam. Ralph's fame has been growing in the past few seasons because the creators have realized that there is so much you can do with such a simple character. Every time Ralph says something, it is funny. I don't think he has ever said anything and my response was not to burst out laughing. This past weekend, view-

"Other" awards for Oscars' best, worst

Associated Press — As befitting Oscar's 70th birth-day, everything was dignified: the clothes, the speeches, the production numbers. The Shrine Auditorium in Los Angeles was packed with celebrities dressed in Armani tuxedos, borrowed jewels and designer gowns by Vera Wang, Escada and Dolce & Gabbana.

But despite the short acceptance speeches, the no-nsense introductions — and the absence of Michael Flatley and "Lord of the Dance" — about two and a half hours into the broadcast, host Billy Crystal stated the obvious: "We're running a little long." It took another hour to wrap things up.

When everyone was finally ready to head out for the round of post–Oscar parties, Titanic had sailed away with 11 Oscars, including best picture and best director; Helen Hunt and Jack Nicholson had won best actress and best actor Oscars for As Good As It Gets; and about 70 Oscar winners (past and present) — including Shirley Temple, Charlton Heston and Sidney Poitier — had gathered on stage for a group portrait. (Too bad that Oscar family moment came so late in the show).

Although some may complain that this year's show didn't have as many of the show–stopping, deliciously unscripted moments of years past, there were a few piquant moments:

Most Authentic Surprise (tie): Best supporting actress winner Kim Basinger, who gasped, "Oh my God," and Robin Williams, who won best supporting actor. Said Williams: "This might be the one time I'm speechless."

Best Couple (tie): Screen legends and frequent co-stars Walter Matthau and Jack Lemmon, who presented the Oscar for best original screenplay to 20–somethings Matt Damon and Ben Affleck, who have been friends since childhood.

You Look Great! Award: Susan Sarandon, wearing a Dolce & Gabbana black–stretch, tulle–fitted evening gown; Kim Basinger in a sleeveless satin ball gown designed by Escada in the color of pistachio; and every-one dressed in Vera Wang including Meg Ryan, Sharon Stone, Holly Hunter, Frances McDormand (OK, maybe she looked a little less "pulled together"), Whoopi Goldberg and Halle Berry.

Best Impromptu Dance Production: Director Stanley Donen, who danced "cheek to cheek" with his Oscar for lifetime achievement.

Worst Staged Dance Production: The choreographed medley of songs, redeemed (somewhat) by the male dancers who went from The Full Monty to Men In Black.

Best Advice to Oscar Nominees: From Frances McDormand, who presented the best actor Oscar. "OK guys, sit up straight and act presentable."

Most Original Use of a Mars Attacks set piece: Cher's headgear.

Most Elegant British Imports: Oscar nominees Julie Christie, Minnie Driver and Helena Bonham Carter. Christie sparkled in an azure blue lace and bias–clip satin gown by Badgley Mischka. Driver was a visual delight in a garnet–red, full–length gown designed by Randolph Duke of Halston. And Bonham Carter looked like a princess in her lavender gown.

Best Snub to Armani and the Rest of the Designer Gang: Drew Barrymore in a daring, black plunging number she bought off the rack. One can only hope the daisies in her hair came from her own garden.

Best Biceps: Madonna.

You're Not Wearing That Are You? Award: Presenter Ashley Judd, whose dress was split way up the front.

Most Likely to Sneer at a Titanic Joke: James Cameron. Most Welcome Words: "Good night every-body," spoken by host Billy Crystal 3 hours, 42 minutes after the Oscar ceremonies began. The record is held by the 1984 show, which timed out at 3:45.

Gerry Hemingway hits Hampden

The Gerry Hemingway Quartet will play at Hampden Theater tonight.

By Joe Sullivan
Collegian Staff

Tonight, the Gerry Hemingway Quartet plays Hampden Theater at 8 p.m. as the second installment of WMEA's Magic Triangle Jazz Concert Series.

Playing selections from Hemingway's latest, Johnny Comes Home, the quartet includes Hemingway on drums, tenor saxo-phonist Ellery Eskelin, bass–player Michael Formanek and Herb Robertson on trumpet.

Gerry Hemingway was born in New Haven, Conn. attended both Wesleyan and Yale and has been producing his craft through both solo and group work since 1974. He has played with the likes of George Lewis, Anthony Davis, Leo Smith, Marion Crispell, Reggie Workman, Oliver Lake and Mark Helias, and currently is also a member of a trio with Helias, as well as the Anthony Davis Ensemble.

In 1978, Hemingway founded Auricle Records, which has carried everything from his earlier works, Kwumbe and Solo Works, to 1993's Down To The Wire, 1995's Slumadon, 1996's Electro–Acoustic Solo Works and Acoustic Solo Works, and his most recent effort, Johnny Comes Home.

Ellery Eskelin has been a band-leader since 1988 and has been fea-tured on Joey Baron's Baron Down, Mark Helias' Attack The Future, and Phil Haynes' 4 Horns & What? Originally from Baltimore, Eskelin has collaborated with scores of other performers, and his most recent release, The Sun Dog, features him in a trio complemented by guitarist Marc Ribot and drummer Kenny Wollesen.

During his nearly 25–year career, Michael Formanek has recorded four albums, Wide Open Spaces, Extended Animation Low Profile and his most recent, Nature Of The Beast, on the Enja label, and his band, Wide Open Spaces, has recently played at the Leverkusener Jazztage in Leverkusen, Germany, the Espoo Festival in Finland, Lincoln Center Out–of Doors in New York, and numerous other venues in Europe and the United States. Most notably, he has collabo-rated with Freddie Hubbard, Stan Getz, Gerry Mulligan, Joe Henderson and Charles Mingus in Mingus's Big Band and Mingus Dynasty.

New Jersey–ite Herb Robertson has collaborated with Mark Helias since 1472, most recently on Attack The Future, but has also recorded four albums of his own. Often focus-ing on the use of mutes, Robertson has also played frequently with Tim Berne and reed man Michael Moore

Ford's Authorized Bootleg coming soon

By Joe Sullivan
Collegian Staff

Blue Thumb Records has issued a promotional live recording entitled The Authorized Bootleg from Robben Ford and The Blue Line, recorded at Yoshi's in Oakland, California on Dec. 5, 1995, hopefully to be released to the general public soon.

Inspired by John Coltrane, Miles Davis, his career has been varied, dippin into jazz, blues, pop and funk. In the past he has played with Joni Mitchell, Michael McDonald, Rickie Lee Jones, Bob Dylan and Bonnie Raitt, among others.

The Authorized Bootleg is Ford and The Blue Line's first live record-ing, and of it he says, "Many of our fans have asked us (over the last few years) for a live recording, and we too have looked for an opportunity to do one."

The CD begins with the jubilant applause of the club's audience, and then breaks into a classic 12–bar blues called, "When I Leave Here," which allows Ford to shine on acoustic guitar. Changing things up on "Chevrolet," the sec-ond track gives a lesson in acoustic funk as it tells the tale of doing everything possible to win a woman who will never be satisfied.

The fourth track, "Start It Up," may be the best on the album as it features a low–down Chicago Blues–esque sound and exceptional soloing. Ford's playing on "Top of the Hill" is pure jazz guitar, while "Help the Poor" reverts back to the funk, but Ford's singing, while solid technically, needs to go deeper.

Throughout the CD, Ford and his ensemble jam constant-ly, making this a recording that fans of jam bands like Phish may enjoy. In many places, Ford's singing is lacking the grit needed to go along with the type of music being played, but overall, not bad.

In the decade before the Civil War, the Underground Railroad conducted escaped slaves to free-dom via secret code songs. Kim and Reggie Harris' Steal Away: Songs of the Underground Railroad (Appleseed) puts these songs in perspective both for historical signifi-cance and musical influence as forerunners of blues and gospel.

The CD includes well–known spirituals such as "Wade in the Water," "Go Down Moses," "Steal Away," "Follow the Drinking Gourd," "Deep River/Swing Low" and "Free At Last," all sung by the Harrises with little or no accompani-ment to capture the true essence of these songs as they origi-nally were.

The version of "Wade in the Water" is incredible for Kim's ability to hit some soulful high notes, while her voice on "Go Down Moses" delivers a haunting solemnity charac-teristic of the song's context. "Sinner Please Don't Let This Harvest Pass" builds in urgency and forcefulness and is another definite highlight.

The music of this CD is both beautiful and inspires hope, while at the same time offering a perspective on the darkest part of this nation's history. Listen, read the liner notes, and rejoice.

Kudos to the people at the "Simpsons" (which includes Oscar award winning director James L. Brooks for As Good As it Gets) for doing a great job.

In other news, George Clooney announced on "Howard Stern" that he would be leaving "ER" at the end of next season. However, Clooney hopes to keep making periodic appearances on NBC's top-rated show.

one being that all the backstabbing takes place in a vacuum without any contrasting goodness, sense of danger or justice. Without it, even in a campy movie, they may as well be shoplifting candy bars. The one-note malice makes this movie just as complacent as another Free Willy sequel.

Further, when the plot started to get really tangled, the dialogue becomes loud, slow and obvious, as if the movie thinks we couldn't understand it on our own. The plot is by far a mile more interesting than the characters.

Unlike film noir, which this movie has been compared to, these characters are not swallowed up by the lure of evil, they simply are evil. The characters do not grow or change, and after awhile even the plot twists get tiring. The moving becomes little more than characters pulling off evil masks to reveal evil faces.

The critics are jumping all over each other to praise this movie as glorious camp and a great time. They are forgetting one tiny thing. It's stupid.

If you take away the serpentine plot, Wild Things is little more than a self-important, overgrown, soft-core porn without nice people. It is, however, easy on the eyes. C

It's a little more than a schoolgirl crush Kelly Van Ryan (Denise Richards) has on her guidance counselor Sam Lombardo (Matt Dillon) in Wild Things.

Forget Oprah, Jerry rules talk TV

By Frazier Moore
Associated Press

NEW YORK — Well, isn't this nice.

The Rev. Billy Graham absolves President Clinton of impolitic horniness. Saddam Hussein is sitting pretty with his bombs and germs. Basketball star Latrell Sprewell gets away with just a slap on one of the hands he used to choke his coach.

And Jerry Springer rules daytime talk TV.

You know the story. "The Jerry Springer Show" has almost doubled its ratings in the past year, and recently has tied with and even beat "The Oprah Winfrey Show."

Why this seventh-season surge for "Springer"? Simple. More brawls, boobs and bad words.

Should a stripper go on maternity leave?

"I'm not hurting nobody," argues Angel who, great with child, proceeds to peel for the whooping studio audience.

Another day, Tony gets to learn, along with millions of viewers, that his girlfriend Tatiana is really a man.

"So whatchu sayin'?" he presses Tatiana in stricken disbelief, just before he tears the place apart.

And don't forget the chap who has deserted his child's mother, a woman who happens to have no arms or legs. For some reason he calls her an assortment of bleeped vulgarities, then, after mixing it up with her current husband, repeatedly threatens to kill him right after the show.

Fine and dandy. We can concede the God-given right of every American to watch "Jerry Springer," and even to appear on it. And as Springer rightly points out, those of us who aren't fans can just go watch something else.

But none of that spares Springer from his own disgrace as the host of such effluent. Maybe somebody's got to do it. But if that person is going to be Jerry — well, shame on him, no matter how agile his claims of immunity.

Hear him profess pride for offering a platform to people he says the media otherwise neglect. Note the respect he voices for his guests, hailing them in one interview as "blatantly honest." And yet, with the snap of a finger, he is happy to belittle the whole "Springer" enterprise.

"I just don't take it that seriously," he says of the show he likes to call "silly."

When viewers tell him his guests are crazy, says Jerry, "I go, 'Duh.'" As host of "Mad TV" one recent week, Springer played himself with gusto in a sketch that nailed his show as the sick joke it is. Yet seldom, if ever, are his guests in on the joke. Or aware that they're the butt of it. "Duh" is right. But that doesn't excuse Jerry.

"It's a crazy world. Have fun with it."

That's Springer's cavalier welcome to viewers on his big-telling "Jerry Springer — Too Hot for TV." But buyer, beware: Apart from unbleeped words and unmasked nudity, this "front-row, uncensored" adult video doesn't differ substantially from what we can see, free of charge, on "Springer" every day.

What we see are people who flaunt and rancorously defend the mess they've made of their lives. None is on TV to listen or learn. They are there to be noticed on a grand scale, whatever the indignities they incur in the bargain.

Show in its history. "South Park" merchandising is everywhere, and doing a boffo business as well — $28 million thus far and counting.

With a new episode next Wednesday and a second season beginning in June, not to mention cover stories by Rolling Stone, Spin and Newsweek (gasp!), the cultural phenomena known as "South Park" looks to have a fresh set of legs for the long haul.

To date, "South Park" has sold to Australia, Germany, Latin America, New Zealand, Canada and the United Kingdom, where it debuted last Friday. Worldwide takeover appears imminent, resistance futile.

according to the co-creators, Parker was the inspiration behind Stan while there's more than a hint of Stone in Kyle the disillusioned Jewish kid.

The story of how what became "South Park" began as a video Christmas card. "The Spirit of Christmas," commissioned by Fox executive Brian Graden.

Graden gave Stone and Parker, who had met making student films at the University of Colorado-Boulder, a $1,200 budget for the Yuletide greeting. According to a recent Rolling Stone interview, Graden claims "they pocketed half of it." The result was typically in-your-face, with Jesus and Santa Claus in a punch-up over the exact meaning of Christmas (presents or religion) and the kind of dialogue that one would expect if "Beavis & Butt-head" were on HBO. "Dudes, don't say 'pig f——r' in front of Jesus" was only one of a slew of memorable utterances in the brief clip.

Surprisingly, "The Spirit of Christmas" became an underground hit in Tinseltown, leading to a spate of offers to Stone and Parker from the studios. In the end, the duo decided on Comedy Central because the station understood what they wanted to achieve.

The now legendary Christmas episode featuring Mr. Hankey drew a whopping 50 percent share of 18-to-24-year- olds, pushing commercial rates up six times above the network's standard price and is the fledgling cable channel's highest rated right on the stage as the dancers effortlessly maneuvered their tapping feet around it. Following through with the construction site images, these workers performed various stunts involving ropes and pulleys. Stringing the ropes across the stage like a spider web, they used the pulleys to pull pieces of the floor up so that the slats were suspended in the air which they then proceeded to use as their stage, tapping their way up and down. Later these slats were hoisted up so that they were hanging vertically, like ladders, which were again used as a forum for tap.

At one point, the people in the first few rows were forced to wear yellow rain ponchos in order to shield themselves from the splash-off as these Dogs bathed in about four inches of water while sporting rubber boots.

After show, these Tap Dogs held a Talk Back. One audience member asked if it was difficult growing up as dancers for these men. Tap Dog Anthony Locascio replied, "the same guys who teased me in grammar school are now the ones who beg me for complimentary tickets."

With a lot of "whoops," "heys," "yeahs," and various other personalized comments, these would-be construction workers verbally encouraged one another as well as eliciting a frenzied response from the audience. They demonstrated the endless variety of rhythmic sounds that can be produced from everyday objects that we take for granted. From the beginning, Tap Dogs was a hit with this UMass audience.

Campus Center

Open Competition for Public Art

The Murray D. Lincoln Campus Center in association with the Campus Center/Student Union Commission is pleased to announce important art competitions being conducted with the purpose of acquiring four mural paintings to compliment the collection of historical murals displayed on the walls of the concourse areas of the Campus Center. These competitions are open to all Umass Amherst students, alumnae, faculty, and staff as well as artists residing in the Amherst vicinity. Materials for the murals will be provided by the Campus Center, and the artists will be awarded stipends as noted below.

SITES AND THEMES

These representational murals will be painted on furniture grade plywood to the dimensions specified for each site. Because we seek a specific type of representational mural, the following site requirements should be considered definitive statements of our expectations. Simplicity is preferred to extreme complexity. Stylistic suggestion may be inferred from the works of notables such as Edward Hopper, Thomas Hart Benton, Diego Riviera. The artists will use paint (acrylic or oil) and drawing. Photographic image transfer processes are not eligible.

Site I: Two panels measuring 4'x8' will be installed to the left and right of the Phyllis Gardner Mural, "The Rope Pull." Accordingly these new panels should compliment the Gardner work in style of painting and by making some reference to the campus pond and/or some activity associated over time with that area. The depiction may be contemporaneous to "The Rope Pull" or consider some other period. The strength of the Gardner work should be respected. The two new works are to be adjuncts. Stipend: $1500

Site II: One panel measuring 4'x16' will be installed on the south wall of the lower concourse adjacent to the Collegian, and WMUA complex. Accordingly the mural should address the historical place of student media in the life of the Campus. Stipend: $1000

Site III: A panel measuring 4'x16' will be installed on the North Wall of the Lower Concourse adjacent to the Auditoria Entrance. The theme here should consider the contributions to the cultural life of the University made by the lecture and distinguished lecturer(s). Stipend: $1000

SELECTION AND JURY CALENDAR

All entries shall be received by April 30, 1998. Entries shall be in the form of prototype paintings to a specified scale at 24" wide. A statement of purpose describing what is being presented, how it would be executed and a rational of suitability for the proposed location should be included. An estimate of materials cost should be included. Also, a brief vitae indicating any previous mural painting experience should accompany the entry.

A jury from the Campus Center/Student Union Commision, the Campus Center Administraton and the University of Massachusetts Art Dept., will review entries and announce selections by May 15, 1998. Work will be completed prior to a final acceptance review by the jury. Final review will be conducted on or about Sept. 1, 1998. The acceptance procedure will be in accordance with the terms of the written agreement to be signed by the artist and the Campus Center Administration.

Proposals are due at the Textbook Annex by April 30, 1998. A second preiliminary rendering may be required of accepted porposers. Questions may be directed to the competition coordinator: Thad Dabrowski, Assistant Manager, Textbook Annex, University of Massachusetts, Amherst, Ma 01003.
Telephone: (413) 545-3570 • email: T_Dabrowski@auxcom.aux.umass.edu

All items submitted must indicate the name, address, and phone number of the entrant or contact person. All entries become property of the Campus Center.

Kentucky hoops benefit with more mature Turner

By Mike Embry
Associated Press

LEXINGTON, Ky. — Wayne Turner has taken his game to a higher level, bringing the Kentucky Wildcats right along with him to the NCAA Final Four.

"If we're going to win games, I have to be at my best the entire game," Turner said before practice Tuesday.

Turner has been at his best in leading Kentucky (33-4) to its third consecutive Final Four, where the Wildcats will play Stanford (30-4) on Saturday in San Antonio.

In the NCAA tournament, Turner has averaged 10.8 points, 6.3 assists, 3.8 rebounds and just 1.3 turnovers a game.

He scored 16 points, including nine in the final nine minutes when the Wildcats rallied from a 17-point deficit to beat Duke, 86-84, on Sunday, and won the South Region's Most Valuable Player.

"He's gotten better at running our offense and knowing our offense better," Kentucky coach Tubby Smith said of Turner's play in postseason.

"He's also knocking down the jump shot. He's gained confidence."

Teammate Scott Padgett said Turner has excelled in the postseason because teams can't prepare for his slashing style.

"In conference play teams know you so well because they see you all the time," he said.

But when you get into the tournament, they only see you on film and then they have to go out and try to guard you."

Turner, who averaged 9.4 points and 4.5 assists during the regular season, also turned up his play in last year's NCAA tournament, averaging 12.7 points, 4.5 assists and 2.8 steals in helping the Wildcats reach the championship game against Arizona.

Turner also won the MVP in this year's Southeastern Conference tournament, after averaging 11.0 points and 6.3 assists.

"He's a terrific point guard," forward Allen Edwards said.

"A lot of people don't respect his game because of his funny shot. They never paid attention to how quick he is and how you can't stop him off the dribble."

Turner does have a quirky jump shot, one that looks as if he's posing for a statue as he softly pushes the ball off his fingertips. But he's become an adequate shooter from the perimeter.

Turner also has improved at the free-throw line. He made just 56.5 percent of his attempts his first two seasons, but is shooting 64.2 this year.

During his first two seasons at Kentucky, he made just five 3-point shots, making only 26.3 percent of his attempts. This year he's made 21-of-56 (37.5 percent) from beyond the arc.

Turner, an elementary education major, has become more of a leader on the floor this season although he is naturally shy and soft-spoken.

"This year I feel I'm getting players to be more aggressive," he said. "I'm more vocal."

Stanford's Weems looks to be sharpshooter again

By Dennis Georgatos
Associated Press

SAN ANTONIO — Kris Weems has no complaints about Stanford's NCAA tournament run. He just wants to do more to keep it going. Weems, the Cardinal's leading scorer for most of the season and their top outside shooter, has suddenly developed accuracy problems.

Arthur Lee and Mark Madsen have picked up the scoring slack, and Stanford (30-4) has advanced to the Final Four, where it will play Kentucky (33-4) on Saturday in San Antonio.

Weems, who led Stanford with an average of 13 points per game during the regular season but is scoring just 5 points a game in Stanford's four tournament wins, knows he has to step up his game.

"I have to play better. I have to shoot better," said Weems, an All Pac-10 selection who has led Stanford in scoring nine times this season. He had a career-high 34 points at Oregon on Jan. 5 and made a dramatic game-winning three-pointer as time ran out in a 74-72 victory at Washington Feb. 19.

But his regular season form has eluded him so far in the tournament, where he is 8-for-34 from the field, including 0-of-10 against Purdue.

"Kris has struggled a little bit from the floor," Stanford coach Mike Montgomery said. "But I think we've kind of had the ability to score from a lot of different positions all season long. "With Kris out, Art's in, Pete Sauer's been a little down, and Ryan Mendez and David Museley have come in. Madsen has been more of a factor. I think it demonstrates that we have an offense that distributes the responsibility around, gives everybody an opportunity and if one guy is not available, we have the ability to go somewhere else."

At the same time, Montgomery said, a renewal of Weems' shooting touch could only help Stanford.

"We're better when Kris is getting open and getting shots and making them," Montgomery said.

Weems looked to be breaking out of his slump in Stanford's last game, a 79-77 win over Rhode Island in Sunday's Midwest Regional championship. He connected from three-point range on his first shot and quickly added a jumper but he took just three more shots the rest of the day, missing all of them.

Lee, who led Stanford's last-minute rally from six points down to defeat Rhode Island, said even though Weems hasn't been scoring, he has helped the team in other ways.

"He's fine and he's definitely happy with where we are. Obviously, he wants to hit more shots than he has been able to, but people have been keying in on him," he said. "It's tough on a shooter when guys are doing everything they can to stop him. But he's been rebounding, playing great defense. He's had to guard some of the toughest 2 guards in the nation and he's been responding. In that respect."

Lee said it was just a matter of time before Weems starts hitting his shots again. He added he wouldn't be surprised if Weems finds the range against Kentucky.

Pats won't match Jets' offer

New England will receive NY's first and third draft picks next month

ORLANDO, Fla. (AP) — The New England Patriots have decided to let star running back Curtis Martin go to the New York Jets, the team's owner said yesterday.

New England decided not to match the offer sheet the restricted free agent signed last Friday with New York. In exchange, the Patriots would get the Jets' first- and third-round choices in next month's draft, owner Robert Kraft said at a press conference with coach Pete Carroll in Orlando, where they were attending NFL meetings.

"In this area of free agency you always have to fill in and fill in," Kraft said. "We'll have our own 1-2-3 and the Jets' 1-2-3, so we'll have... top picks in the draft."

In an earlier trade, the Patriots had received the Jets second-round pick.

"The draft is very deep this year and for us to get those picks from our division rival will help solidify our future," Kraft said.

The Patriots had until midnight tomorrow to match the Jets offer and had asked the NFL to void a provision in the offer sheet prohibiting a team from declaring Martin a franchise player. But a ruling seemed unlikely before the Patriots would have to decide whether to match the offer.

The offer sheet gave Martin the option of one year for $4 million or six years for $36 million. If the Patriots matched the one-year offer without being able to declare him a franchise player, he would be an unprotected free agent after that year.

The Patriots already received four Jets picks — third- and fourth-rounders in 1997, a second in 1998 and a first in 1999 — in exchange for letting New York sign Bill Parcells as its coach last year. With two more picks this year, New England would have two choices in each of the first three rounds.

Martin, a third-round draft pick in 1995, led the AFC in rushing as a rookie and made the Pro Bowl his first two seasons. He rushed for 1,160 yards last season but missed the last three regular-season games and both playoff games with shoulder and abdominal injuries. He later had abdominal surgery.

Lacrosse club drops tough opener

The University of Massachusetts lacrosse club is back in action, having started its season March 7 against junior college power SUNY–Farmingdale. UMass lost a tight contest, 10-8.

UMass jumped out to a 2-0 lead in the first quarter on goals by Stephan Vutrano and Owen Poland. Poland pushed the visiting lead to three with a man-up goal on a Vutrano assist. But Farmingdale would not remain quiet, as it rattled off three unanswered to knot the score at halftime.

The third quarter almost mirrored the second, as Poland completed his hat trick and the hosts tallied twice for a 5-4 Farmingdale advantage.

Lee Thompson and Vutrano each pocketed two in the fourth quarter, but Farmingdale matched UMass' total to take the win. Mike Nowlan and Phuc Thai anchored the last line of defense with their play in the UMass net.

Brendan Keenan and Levence Fustay picked up "Heart & Hustle" awards for their efforts in the game.

Ballroom dancer captures wins

Marianka Madey, a member of the UMass Ballroom Dance club, outshone her competition at a recent event held at Rensselaer Polytechnic Institute in Troy, N.Y.

The freshman and her partner took first place in the silver level and second in the gold level in the international division of waltz, quickstep, tango and foxtrot.

Mandey also took home first place in the adult division of the same dances.

It's Big Ten for title, Bulldogs for NIT third

By Tom Withers
Assoxiated Press

NEW YORK — The Big Ten is in, the Bulldogs are out. Minnesota and Penn State, who split their two conference games this season in the Big Ten, earned the right Tuesday night to play for a third time with semifinal victories in the NIT.

The Gophers outlasted Fresno State, 91-89 in overtime, and the Nittany Lions advanced to the first basketball championship game in their history with a 66-60 win over Georgia.

The Minnesota-Penn State final assures the Big Ten of winning a second straight NIT after Michigan won the crown in 1997. And the matchup will be the first between schools from the same conference since Indiana beat Purdue in 1979 — another all-Big Ten final.

"We had two tough games against them," Penn State freshman guard Joe Crispin, who had 18 points Tuesday night, said of Minnesota. "They're tough."

The Fresno State-Georgia consolation game will precede the title game and match Bulldogs vs. Bulldogs.

The Nittany Lions (19-12), playing in their third NIT final four in the '90s, will have a little added pressure on them tonight.

During a late timeout with Penn State leading Georgia 55-54, the crowd of 11,043 at Madison Square Garden was informed that the Nittany Lions' women's team had just defeated Baylor to win the women's NIT.

The sizable State contingent erupted into chants of "We are, Penn State" and although the guys wouldn't later admit it, they seemed inspired enough to outscore the Bulldogs (19-15) 11-8 in the final 3:42.

"Really?" Penn State center Calvin Booth said when told of the ladies' win. "I didn't hear that. I guess we have to win now."

In the first game, Kevin Clark scored a career-high 30 points and Sam Jacobson added 24 to lead Minnesota (19-15), which played in the real Final Four last year.

For Fresno State, a season of scandal, which included arrests, suspensions and substance abuse problems for some of its star players, will end with a consolation matchup with the tourney's other Bulldogs from Georgia.

Mike Wallace, the correspondent for CBS' "60 Minutes," who recently did a piece exposing all of the Bulldogs' off-court transgressions, sat near midcourt for the first game.

After the story was aired, Fresno State coach Jerry Tarkanian criticized Wallace for not being up front with him about its content. But at halftime, Wallace, a guest of Tarkanian's, said he and the coach spoke before the game and had "a very civilized conversation."

"This loss really hurts because of all the adversity we went through," said Tarkanian, whose club won its previous three tournament games by a total of eight points.

Jermaine Fowlkes led Fresno State (21-12) with 25 points and Chris Herren had 14 — all in the second half.

"With all the trials and tribulations this year, it felt like a long year," Fowlkes said. "We tried to round it off by at least going to the championships, but we can't hold our heads down. Just being in the postseason is great for us. Coach Tark has endured a long season with us, and we've all stuck through this."

The second meeting between Fresno State and Minnesota was much tighter that the first, a 92-72 win by the Gophers in December. The clubs went at each other hard from the outset, and went to overtime tied at 77.

Herren's free throw with 2:52 left in OT gave the Bulldogs an 82-81 lead before Jacobsen was fouled and made two to put the Gophers back up.

After Fowlkes missed — only his second in 12 attempts — Jacobson scored underneath to put Minnesota up by three with 2:10 remaining. Herren's bucket cut it to 85-84, and the Bulldogs got a chance to take the lead when Quincy Lewis missed, but Herren turned the ball over.

Lewis made two free throws with 48 seconds left, and the Gophers closed it out at the free throw line after Herren lost control of the ball while making a baseline move.

Clark, who scored 21 points against Fresno State earlier this season, went 9-for-16 from the field and 9-for-9 from the line. In the second semi, Pete Lisicky scored 13 points for Penn State, making a pair of late 3-pointers to stop Georgia rallies. Freshman Jumaine Jones led the Bulldogs with 23 points and 15 rebounds, and Michael Chadwick had 12 points.

Trailing 46-36, the Bulldogs picked up their defensive pressure and went on a 13-4 run to close to 50-49. But Lisicky bailed out Penn State with a 3-pointer with five minutes left.

"His entire four years here, he's been a guy who does things like that," Penn State coach Jerry Dunn said. "There are players who want to take shots during the game. He wants to take a shot if the game is on the line."

The Elis had also stifled the Crusader scoring attack with a solid defensive effort, allowing only three goals.

Yale's strength became evident early as freshman goalie Jen Nardi faced a flurry of shots from the Eli attack line, although she still managed to make nine saves on the day. Fellow freshman goalkeeper Tara Durking also saw time in net and likewise, was able to turn away nine Yale scoring attempts.

It was not enough, however, as the Minutewomen could not keep up with their opponents' scoring and shooting sprees. The Elis ended up outshooting UMass, 33-23, limiting the team to its lowest shot total thus far.

Attempting to keep it close for the Minutewomen was the team's leading scorer, junior attack Laura Korutz, who had four of the team's six goals. New Haven remained a dreary place for most of the other UMass players though, as the Yale defensive front was strong enough to disrupt several passes and subsequent shot attempts as the Minutewomen ventured into the Eli zone.

Senior midfielder Jen Herker and freshman attack Fay Naber made up the remainder of the UMass offensive output with one goal a piece, while sophomore midfielder Stephanie Pavlick tallied two assists and senior attack Jen Bowen had one.

Although McClellan was unable to garner the win against her old school, this year's showing was an improvement over last season's loss to Yale, which was a 20-5 drumming that saw the Elis tally nearly twice as many shots as the Minutewomen.

Also an integral part of the Eli defense was goalkeeper, junior Alison Cole. Cole frustrated would-be UMass scorers all day as she deftly turned aside 16 shot attempts.

The Minutewomen will not have much time to mope around about this one, however, as they will have to bounce back to face another strong squad in No. 2 Temple on Saturday.

Tarkanian takes Wallace to task on "60 Minutes"

NEW YORK (AP) — Mike Wallace, the CBS-TV correspondent, was Jerry Tarkanian's guest at the NIT semifinals.

The Fresno State coach had a purpose in the invitation. He wanted to tell Wallace he didn't appreciate his handling of a story on the team on "60 Minutes" earlier this month.

"I invited you here to tell you to your face that you lied to us," Tarkanian said Tuesday night at Madison Square Garden, the Daily News reported yesterday.

The coach said he had been assured by Wallace that the segment would be fair.

The piece detailed the Fresno State's off-the-court problems, including drug-related suspensions, assault arrests and accusations of point shaving.

Tarkanian told Wallace that his presentation was a rehash of old news.

"It was new to America," Wallace replied, noting the segment had been strongly praised by the press.

went 2-for-4 while scoring one run.

UMass padded their lead with three additional runs in the sixth and seventh innings to secure the win. Providence produced four more runs, but they proved not enough.

The Friars struggled at the plate as eight batters failed to reach first. Angelo Cininicllo led the way with a 3-for-5 outing which included a team-leading two RBI. The first baseman, Mike O'Keefe, had two hits on five attempts with one run scored. Scott Friedholm was granted two walks and scored two runs for Providence.

Freshmen Nick Skirkanich and David Loonie eached pitched an inning striking out one batter apiece while facing five batters each.

Tuesday also marked a historical game in which Dalfere became the all-time UMass leader in career hits after going 2-4 including a two-run home run for a current total of 200 hits. He surpassed Bill Knight's record of 203. Dagliere ranks second on Massachusetts all-time career RBI total of 144. Providence offered six pitchers to duel with the explosive Minutemen.

Massachusetts was scheduled to play yesterday against the Crusaders of Holy Cross, but it was postponed until today at 3 p.m. This weekend they will begin their Atlantic 10 schedule as they travel to La Salle for a three-game series.

UM's Henderson pitches into national spotlight

By Jorma Kansanen
Collegian Staff

Danielle Henderson is not a monster.

Even though the junior pitcher for the Massachusetts softball team has been affectionately nicknamed "Harry," after the fictional Bigfoot-esque character portrayed in the movies, the 6-foot-2 native of Commack, N.Y. is not a menacing figure — off the field.

Rather than incessant roaring, Henderson is more apt to elevated whispering when she talks, and you will not find a shaggy coat on her unless she is pitching a doubleheader somewhere in the upper Yukon. We all unintentionally break things now and then, but unlike the fictional character, the demolition of furniture when it concerns the real-life Harry of the Long Island Hendersons is right out.

> "Nobody will ever know what that felt like except for our team. It's something to make us work harder this year, and make it there again."
> — Danielle Henderson on the Women's College World Series.

That said, Danielle Henderson is not a monster — off the field, that is.

On the field, however, the 1997 Atlantic 10 Pitcher of the Year, third team All-American and Women's College World Series All-Tournament team selection is a monster in the Bela Lugosi vein. This season, the accolades have already begun to roll in for Henderson, and last week she was named the National Fastpitch Coaches Association National Player of the Week for her showing at the Lady Seminole Invitational in Tallahassee, Fla.

Her opponents in Tallahassee must have thought she was the reincarnation of the fictional character, as the literal and figurative standout for the Minutewomen (11–10) posted a 5–1 record with 73 strikeouts in 44 innings of work. All of that was done while also allowing only 14 hits (13 singles), without giving up an earned run along the way.

And, by the way, all five of those wins were shutouts.

Against all these personal accomplishments, coach Elaine Sortino considers Henderson the consummate team player. While Harry might be considered a monster on the mound, she is far from that in every other aspect in her life.

"I'm glad she's on our side," Sortino said. "[The NFCA award was] a tremendous tribute to what she did against some more than formidable opponents. She's a great kid, and her heart is as big as a field.

"It's never been about her since the first day I've met her. If you watch her in the dugout, she's cheering everybody on at the plate. She's a great human being, and you can't help but love to be around her."

For Henderson, this award was for just one reason, and one reason only — doing her job. Any other reason would be stepping on her already minutely-sized ego.

"It was kind of weird, because I was just out there doing my job," Henderson said. "The coach called and told me, and I was just like, 'Oh, okay.' It's a big difference than the awards I've received at UMass because of all the players in the country you're going up against."

Top of the tops

Henderson's selection as the NFCA National Player of the Week is only one part — granted a major one — of a long list of achievements the junior hurler has accomplished in the past two and a half years. After an All-Everything freshman season (Conference, Tournament, New England and Northeast selection) that saw her selected as the A-10 Rookie of the Year, Harry built off that success to place herself as one of the top pitchers in the nation.

In only her second season, Henderson set 13 UMass pitching records (including this season, 16 records) and currently holds every single-game mark in the book. Amongst those records were her 63.2 inning shutout streak, which included the A-10 Tournament and the NCAA play-in series with Canisius, and her 335 strikeouts, which set both the UMass and A-10 single season records.

However, the performance that stood head and shoulders above the rest was during the NCAA Regionals at Totman Field last May. After her domination of Canisius in the play-in series, Henderson and her teammates faced off with the nation's best — which included the likes of then-No. 8 Colorado State.

Due to their 2–0 loss to CSU the day before, the Minutewomen needed to win two games in the Sunday final against the highly touted Ram squad. But in the end, CSU coach Candi Letts and her squad were rerouted from their already ticketed trip to the WCWS — annually held in Oklahoma City — back to Fort Collins, Colo.

Henderson racked up a 4–1 record (0.40 ERA) with 39 strikeouts on the weekend, while winning three games that final day to take the honor of Tournament MVP. The dream-like run to make the WCWS still runs through her mind, and in her estimation, the team can make it back to Oklahoma City this season.

JORMA KANSANEN / COLLEGIAN

Danielle Henderson may not be a monster off the field, but she is an intimating presence on it.

> "She's a wonderful Sony television set with a 32-inch screen, and she just needs some fine tuning and adjusting."
> — Softball coach Elaine Sortino on Danielle Hendererson.

Big dreams

All this success has placed Henderson in the national spotlight. Along with one of her teammates, first baseman Kim Gutridge, Henderson has already begun to make the next step up the ladder from collegiate competition — the national team. Last fall, both Minutewomen were selected by USA Softball to an elite pool of 60 athletes, and trained with the best of the nation's best in San Diego over intersession.

Just last week, Henderson returned to California after her success at the Lady Seminole Invitational, and trained with the U.S. team. Gold medalists Lisa Fernandez, Dot Richardson and Michelle Smith were there on the same softball field as the overgrown kid from Amherst with the monster's nickname.

The feedback from USA Softball concerning Henderson's future in the game she loves has been nothing but positive, as is her outlook on her future.

"It's a great atmosphere [to train in]," Henderson said. "These are the players who I look up to and admire, and there I am on the same field. Who knows, maybe I can make the 2000 Olympic team.

"It's a good goal, and its closer than I ever thought it would be. I've always wanted to play in the Olympics, and now here I am in their training camp. I feel amazed and honored every time I go there."

If you want to get in line for the Danielle Henderson fan club, you better take a place behind Sortino, Harry's No. 1 fan. Sortino has seen Henderson's progression from a thrower to a pitcher in her first two years at UMass, and now, the dream of being part of the 2000 Olympics in Sydney, Australia is only a step away.

On the field or off the field — whether she is really a monster or not — Henderson is still the living and breathing epitome of living out a dream for Sortino.

"We all have dreams, but she has big dreams," Sortino said. "She has the work ethic and the ability, and she has the heart of a champion. Right now, she's a wonderful Sony television set with a 32-inch screen, and she just needs some fine tuning and adjusting.

"The thing that supports her is the opportunity to

Women's lax drops first game

By Jamie Jee

The Massachusetts women's lacrosse team was upended yesterday by a solid Yale squad, which dealt the Minutewomen their first loss of the season, 13–6.

Going into yesterday's contest, UMass (2–1), knew the task of defeating the No. 14 ranked Elis (3–0) would be daunting, but they had high hopes, those of which rested upon shutting down Yale's star attacks Heather Bentley, Alyssa Chen and Erin Porta.

Although the Minutewomen defense managed to limit the Elis' leading goal scorer in Chen to one goal, Bentley snuck in three, while Porta contributed with two assists. Both teams had come into yesterday's game after facing Holy Cross and UMass knew that Yale had scored 15 goals, posing a serious threat to their perfect record with such offensive capability.

Dagliere all–time UM hits leader

By Kathleen Ralls
Collegian Staff

After breaking even over winter break, the Massachusetts baseball team regrouped for the long haul of the rest of the season. Their first stop was on Tuesday when they blasted Providence (13–7), 14–8. With the victory, the Minutemen improve their record to 6–5. Sophomore lefthander Travis Veracka was the winning hurler, allowing just five hits in six innings with seven strikeouts, improving to 2–0. Junior righthander Ryan Cameron was the closer with one full inning of work. The Friar's Rob Corraro was on the losing end, going 4.1 innings and allowing seven earned runs. His record fell to 1– 3 on the year.

Neither team seemed to find their way around the plate as they went scoreless through two innings. Both teams broke their spell with two runs apiece in the third inning. UMass also tallied a run in the third to take the lead while holding Providence scoreless.

After four innings, the Minutemen exploded on the Friars for eight runs. Shortstop Bryan Mazzaferro tipped off with a triple and tallied the first run of the inning after Dagliere reached on an error credited to the right fielder. He drove in a game-high four runs. Mazzaferro would return for a second helping in the fifth and connect for the first Massachusetts grand slam of this season. Dagliere also smacked a home run.

UMass racked up 14 hits on the afternoon. All but one starter had a hit for the Minutemen. Leftfielder Steve Asadoorian went 3–for–5 with two RBI while Shaun Skeffington went 2–for–4 with a double and a triple. Third baseman Seth Kaplan

Marcos admits to hiding $800 million

MANILA, Philippines (AP) — Imelda Marcos claimed yesterday to have more than $800 million stashed away in foreign banks, all of which she promised to give to poor Filipinos if she is elected president.

"If you know how rich you are, you are not rich," the widow of dictator Ferdinand Marcos said. "But me, I am not aware of the extent of my wealth. That's how rich we are."

It is the first time Mrs. Marcos has publicly admitted her family has more wealth than that discovered by the government since Marcos was ousted in a popular revolt in 1986.

Marcos died in 1989, accused of plundering about $10 billion from the national treasury during his 20-year rule. He never admitted any wrongdoing.

Mrs. Marcos said the $800 million does not include $540 million the government has discovered her husband had in various accounts in two Swiss banks.

"There is more Marcos wealth that this government is not yet aware of, but for the time being, I can admit that there is only $800 million kept in various international banks, but I cannot reveal them," Mrs. Marcos told a press forum in Manila.

Navy ordered to reinstate officer

WASHINGTON (AP) — A federal judge told the Navy yesterday to comply with his order reinstating a chief petty officer who successfully fought dismissal from the military over allegations of homosexuality.

U.S. District Court Judge Stanley Sporkin said the Navy should return Timothy R. McVeigh to his old status as the top enlisted man on a nuclear attack submarine rather than give him only clerical jobs.

Setting a June 1 hearing, Sporkin gave the Navy two months to comply with his January order in the case in which he said the Navy wrongly enforced the Pentagon's "don't ask, don't tell" policy on gays in the military.

Christopher Wolf, McVeigh's attorney, accused the Navy of "dragging its feet" and purposely keeping the decorated 17-year veteran from returning to his former duties that would let him advance his career.

"He used to be in the chief of boat position," Wolf said after the court hearing yesterday. In that job, McVeigh managed the day-to-day activities of a nuclear attack submarine, the USS Chicago. "And now he's stuck with clerical duties."

Justice Department attorney David Glass, representing the government, told the judge one chief of boat position had opened up recently, but McVeigh wasn't deemed the best candidate.

Faculty Senate discusses concerns about tenure

By Victoria Graves
Collegian Staff

The procedures surrounding the removal of tenured faculty was discussed yesterday afternoon at the University of Massachusetts Faculty Senate meeting.

A trustee document has been circulating throughout the University community which has not been approved, but has raised concern among professors in general.

"There was a document circulated concerning removing faculty who have tenure. It was not an approved procedure. The issue is becoming generally known on campus... it needs a resolution that can be broadly accepted," said Joseph Larson, chair of the Rules Committee.

There has been a request filed to bring the issue to the bargaining table in the future.

"We are fully aware of the procedure that has been circulating and we have filed a request to bargain with the provost's office," said Jenny Spencer, president of the Massachusetts Society of Professors.

Also addressed at the meeting was the yearly open house for prospective students to be held by the Admissions Office this Saturday. Some senators expressed concern for the state of Fraternity Row after a Friday night.

"Frat[ernity] Row is going to be an absolute pit Saturday morning. Could some pressure be used to call frats and ask them to pick up so it doesn't look like a dump for students and their parents?" said Brian O'Connor, Faculty delegate to the Board of Trustees.

Vice Chancellor for Student Affairs Thomas Robinson also expressed concern and told the senate body that he would be speaking with Michael Wiseman, Director of Greek Affairs.

Senator John Bracey expressed concern about the CATE (Course And Teacher Evaluation) guide that may be voted on by the board of trustees in the future and may be included in bargaining negotiations.

"We had a joint meeting with SGA and GSS (Graduate Student Senate). I thought we had an agreement not to include it in the bargaining process... was there some misunderstanding?" Bracey said.

Chancellor David K. Scott stated that he is not responsible for what ends up on the bargaining table.

"I don't have one hundred percent control over what ends up at the bargaining table," Scott said.

"I do think that now it's gotten beyond this campus. There's a lot of pressure from students... it may only be achieved through bargaining," Spencer said.

Lia Wong, Student Government Association (SGA) outgoing President gave a farewell address to those present and called upon past communications as building blocks for future student and faculty relations.

"I wanted to thank students for the opportunity to represent them at the faculty senate. Together we laid a foundation... let us build on the communication build this year," Wong said.

GEO agency fee debated

GEO expects to ratify new contract despite agency fee controversy

By Jason Eiseman
Collegian Staff

The Graduate Employee Organization (GEO) held a contract ratification election yesterday and Wednesday from 4–9 p.m. in the University of Massachusetts Cape Cod Lounge.

The results will be announced today, and many employees expect the contract to be ratified though some are voting against the ratification of the contract.

Charlie Bam-Aldred, a graduate student in the School of Management, opposes the contract which was agreed upon between GEO and the University of Massachusetts administration earlier this month.

"I don't believe graduate students should be fired because of their inability to pay an agency fee," Bam Aldred said. He said because GEO is now a recognized union, employees will be required to pay an agency fee in lieu of union dues. Bam-Aldred is upset because if a member does not pay his dues they can be fired by the union.

Mahmood Ketabchi, GEO President, defends the new contract, saying GEO does not want to fire employees, but is legally within their right if it comes down to that.

"An agency fee is something that all public employee unions have a right to collect," Ketabchi said. He said the agency fee by law is a term of employment. "We don't intend to fire anyone."

Ketabchi said there is a process GEO must go through if a member does not pay their agency fee, and that terminating that employee is a last resort.

If GEO ratifies the contract, it only requires the approval of UMass President William Bulger. Originally it was thought the UMass Board of Trustees would also have to approve the contract, but GEO staff said a copy of the contract was sent to Bulger, and only his approval is required.

"It's a good contract," said Dave Hammer, a steward for the Labor Center and GEO staff member. "I have no real concerns that people will vote against it because they have problems with small pieces."

Other GEO members said they also expect the contract to be ratified.

"We do expect it to be ratified," Ketabchi said. "We're quite sure people realize how much work has gone into this contract, we're quite sure it will be ratified."

The negotiations of this contract have ended two

Lewinsky job transfer focus for grand jury

By Larry Margasak
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The White House personnel chief testified before a federal grand jury yesterday, signaling a strong focus by Whitewater prosecutors on Monica Lewinsky's administration jobs — including her transfer to the Pentagon.

Marsha Scott appeared for a second time in a week before the grand jurors, who have heard from a half-dozen witnesses who played roles in Ms. Lewinsky's White House work prior to her April 1996 reassignment to the Defense Department.

After Ms. Scott finished testifying, the president's chief of Oval Office operations, Nancy Hernreich, made her third appearance at the courthouse. Ms. Hernreich sees virtually everyone who enters the president's office. Both women are expected to return another day for more testimony.

The testimony of witnesses familiar with Ms. Lewinsky's role could be valuable to prosecutors, even if the staffers were unaware of a Clinton-Lewinsky sexual relationship. They might be able to shed light on Ms. Lewinsky's frequent appearances around the Oval Office despite her low-level tasks — a possible factor in her transfer.

Ms. Lewinsky told a friend that she had a sexual affair with Clinton and he asked her to lie about it, contradicting

UM students visit Senegal in educational trip

In a nationwide effort to address the issue of poverty, University of Massachusetts students Jennifer Oliver and Douglas Elmendorf returned Monday from a nine day trip to West Africa.

The trip was organized by Oxfam America, an international non-government aid agency, as part of its Alternative Spring Break program.

Oliver and Elmendorf both music majors, traveled with the Oxfam group and 15 other college students to the country of Senegal where they witnessed first-hand problems of poverty and the solutions being implemented by local people.

Oliver and Elmendorf met scores of strong, enterprising Africans who are working to improve their lives through forming non-profit and non-government organizations, in partnership with Oxfam. These Africans are making changes in efforts to help provide the Senegalese children with an opportunity to receive an education.

Oliver and Elmendorf said the real problem of poverty in the African community is the result of a poorly supported educational system.

"The student's interest in learning is not coupled with an adequate learning environment or reading materials, and Oxfam America and other organizations are working to change that," Elmendorf said.

Senegalese children start public education at age 7, two years later than American children, but the projected numbers attending or enrolled have dropped significantly.

According to an Oxfam press release, currently 44 million African primary school-aged children do not go to school.

More and more children are needed to work at home and do not have the opportunity to get an education,

Stonewall Center holds Brown Bag Lunch Series; Manahan reflects on past

By Chaya Radin
Collegian Correspondent

A small, yet enthusiastic crowd welcomed Nancy Manahan, author of On My Honor: Lesbians Reflect on Their Scouting Experience yesterday during the weekly Brown Bag Lunch Series sponsored by the Stonewall Center.

Manahan's book is a compilation of 32 personal essays about lesbians' personal experiences while involved with the Girl Scouts and Girl Guides. Girl Guides is an organization which is similar to the Girl Scouts.

The idea for On My Honor, according to Manahan, came from personal experiences following her participation in the Girl Scouts during her youth.

Manahan said inspiration for the book came when talking to the woman, who is now her partner, in an "attempt to understand what it is about Girl Scouts and lesbians."

She showed how the relationship of lesbians to Girl Scouts contains both positive and negative aspects. Manahan did this when she described how there are some Girl Scout troop leaders who go out of their way to end homophobia, but, "The [structure of the organization] is really fundamentally conservative," Manahan said. She feels there is still homophobia in the organization of the Girl Scouts.

Manahan also discussed the differences between Boy Scouts and Girl Scouts, and how she feels the two are

Suspect admits to stealing guns

By David A. Lieb
Associated Press

LITTLE ROCK, Ark. — The grandfather of the 11-year-old charged in a deadly school yard ambush said Wednesday the boy admitted stealing seven guns from him and pulling the fire alarm that forced the victims into the line of fire.

His grandson did not confess to killing four classmates and a teacher, however, saying he couldn't recall what happened, Doug Golden told The Associated Press on Wednesday.

"He told me he fired some shots," said Golden, who talked to his grandson, Andrew Golden, with police in jail after Tuesday's shooting.

"He said he shot at a car on the parking lot but 'I don't remember anything after that,'" said Golden, the manager of a wildlife area.

A Juvenile Court judge on Wednesday ordered Andrew and his alleged accomplice, Mitchell Johnson, 13, held until an April 29 hearing. The two are charged with five counts of murder and 10 counts of battery. They did not enter a plea.

After he heard about the shootings at Westside Middle School, Doug Golden drove from hospital to hospital fearing Andrew might be among the wounded. Instead, he was directed to the sheriff's office.

"After we got out to the jail and found him, they brought the guns in and I recognized them," he said.

Golden said the boy then admitted stealing three rifles, four handguns and several boxes of ammunition from his house.

His grandson had his own weapons, Golden said, including a shotgun, two rifles, a crossbow and a bow, but didn't know the combination to the steel vault at his house where they were kept, so he and Mitchell tried breaking in.

"We were told the other boy brought a torch and hammer and some other tools to try to break into the gun vault and they couldn't do it," he said.

So the two broke into his house and took the rifles from a gunrack and found pistols that were hid "all over the house," Golden said.

The boys, who had skipped school Tuesday, also took a white van from Mitchell's house and parked it near the school, Golden said. Police said the boys shot from a wooded hill at the rear of the school.

Ireland talks at Amherst College

By Laura Barcella
Collegian Staff

Patricia Ireland, president of the National Organization for Women (NOW), gave a lecture Wednesday night at Amherst College's Johnson Chapel.

In Amherst to promote her new book, What Women Want, Ireland spoke for about an hour and a half before an audience of 75 people.

Ireland began the discussion by recalling her own days in college, and the events which sowed the seeds of her activism. She recalled, "people were still arguing that women didn't deserve equal pay for equal work."

Ireland related an event which summarized the state of women's affairs when she was in college. She got married in college, and her mother accompanied her to the doctor to receive birth control before the wedding. The doctor, however, would not issue contraception because she was still unwed. He instructed her to "come back after the ceremony."

However, Ireland considered her "most relevant experience" to be her years working as a flight attendant for PanAm airlines. She recalled spending seven years "walking down aisles taking people's garbage and thanking them for it... [Back then] we didn't even have the words 'sexual harassment.' I assumed it was the price we had to pay in the work place."

The discrepancies in men and women's job benefits inspired Ireland to activism, she stated. Working as a flight attendant at PanAm, female employees did not receive benefits to cover their families. This angered Ireland, and she called NOW for advice.

She stated that she got a "sense of empowerment" after fighting for women's benefits. "By fighting for something I needed for my family, I had won for other women's families."

Ironically, PanAm eventually went bankrupt, and Ireland went on to become president of the most powerful national feminist organization.

Ireland continued to reflect on the positive changes the women's movement has made over the years. She identified a national "backlash" to feminism, as well as confusion about "what sexual harassment is and isn't," especially now that there are more women in positions of power. "Whenever women are in position of power, there is resistance," Ireland said.

Ireland read an excerpt from her book about how women's sexuality is used against them. She stated that there are "a minority of men who don't want to compete with women on an equal basis," and the more non-traditional the job a woman has, the more threatened such men feel.

Ireland spoke a great deal about sexual harassment, and the ways it is used to "keep women in their place." She also spoke of how harassers attempt to "let women know that they will always be reduced to a set of body parts."

She described the ways in which men attempt to degrade victims of sexual harassment in court, "any adult behavior can be used against women; drinking, smoking, sex."

Ireland went on to state that people attempt to justify the harassment in such cases by saying a victim "wasn't harassed, [because] she was promiscuous."

Ireland also voiced her opinions on the Clinton sex scandal. She stated her belief that many people are letting Clinton off the hook by calling him an "otherwise good president," and by dismissing the many allegations of crude sexual advances.

Ireland stated that throughout Clinton's presidency, he has led a number of "breakthroughs" for women, but she implored her audience to consider a question, "Is a real man one who verbally or physically attacks women? I don't think so."

Ireland stated her belief that some of Clinton's alleged sexual advances could be considered sexual assault. She continued, "When you start talking about allegations, we have to say 'that is not a good president'... It's against the law, and it's just unacceptable."

Towards the end of her lecture, Ireland gave some inspirational advice to the audience. She encouraged women to make changes in whatever ways they can, and that "there is a role for every one of us to play... I encourage you to help continue this strong movement... You will all be able to make a difference somewhere."

not connected in any way.

Boy Scouts, Manahan said, have a policy which actively discriminates against gays, while the Girl Scouts have a policy similar to the Army's "don't ask, don't tell" policy. This policy states the organization does not discriminate based on sexual orientation, but that no sexual orientation is usually advocated.

Audience members engaged in discussion with Manahan, following her lecture. Topics included personal experiences with the Girl Scouts and Girl Guides organizations, including being a scout leader, camp counselor or troop member. Many women in the audience described the differences they saw between their experiences in Girl Scout troops and at summer camp.

"Troops," one woman at the lecture claimed, "often feed into the 'Barbie Doll Syndrome,'" meaning women being taught traditional female activities that do not challenge or interest them.

Summer camp experiences were described in a more positive light by many audience members. Women spoke of being taught when they were Girl Scouts that they were capable of anything, and were provided with a safe, warm environment.

Manahan concluded her lunch time presentation by reading a passage from her book, which described the experience of a girl in the Girl Guides during the 1960s.

years of negotiations between the administration and GEO, including a temporary impasse, and finally the mediation which led to the contract settlement.

Jennifer Fasulo, GEO Vice President, said the contract has "unprecedented accomplishments."

"I don't think it has everything I wanted," Fasulo said. "But it has a lot more than we would have gotten if we didn't work as hard."

Fasulo said this was the first time in the history of GEO's negotiations with the administration that GEO has earned a raise for every graduate employee and such a large increase in child care funding.

"I'm quite satisfied with it," said Ceren Ozselcuk, a graduate student in the economics department. She said she voted to ratify the contract.

her affidavit in the Paula Jones case denying a sexual relationship. The president has said there was no affair or suggestion that she lie.

Those who previously testified included:

• Former White House deputy chief of staff Evelyn Lieberman. Current and former White House officials have said that she wanted Ms. Lewinsky transferred because of "inappropriate and immature behavior."

• Timothy Keating, who hired Ms. Lewinsky in the legislative correspondence section when her internship ended. He said after testifying that Ms. Lewinsky was "transferred because of dissatisfaction with her performance..."

• Patsy Thomasson, who was a White House personnel official. She said after her testimony that she gave the grand jury "the facts about her placement at the Pentagon."

• Jodie Torkelson, who also was a personnel aide. Her lawyer said after she testified Wednesday that she was asked about an e-mail memo she wrote in 1996. She asked in the memo that she be notified if Ms. Lewinsky sought another White House job.

• Jocelyn Jolley, who was Ms. Lewinsky's direct supervisor in the legislative affairs office. Ms. Jolley was transferred out of the office the same day as Ms. Lewinsky.

Ms. Scott has known Clinton from his days as Arkansas governor, and an incident in his deposition in the Jones case indicates she's a confidante of the president.

As Clinton related the incident, he was attending a high school reunion in Arkansas in 1994 and got into a conversation with an old friend, Dolly Kyle Browning.

According to the president, Ms. Browning was angry that he had not called her back in 1992 when she was concerned that a tabloid was going to run a story about her. The president said she began a jealous tirade about how unhappy she was that she had never had a sexual relationship with Clinton and threatened to sell a book claiming they did.

Clinton said he asked Ms. Scott "to listen to the conversation when it started, and she stood very close so she could hear everything, and then as soon as the conversation was over, I asked her if she had heard it..."

The president said he later made notes of the conversation and asked Ms. Scott if they were consistent with her memory "and she said 'Yes, except I think that the conversation went on a little longer than you said ...'"

Clinton testified he put the notes in a file folder, which went in a briefcase that was stored under his desk.

Ms. Browning, a Dallas real estate attorney who gave a deposition in the Jones case, has said she had a long affair with Clinton and accused him of lying in his deposition.

She said that at no time was Ms. Scott listening to the conversation, although a woman with blond hair (Ms. Scott is a blond) did interrupt their conversation twice to ask Clinton to end the conversation, which he did not do.

A modest proposal

I think I have figured out a way to solve all of our problems. I have a way to repair all of the social ills plaguing us. I know how to end racism and sexism, ego and egotism, inferiority complexes...they will all be things of the past. My plan, which is in the same vein as Jonathan Swift's Modest Proposal, involves the use of technology, which was, in many ways, perfected here at the University of Massachusetts. I am talking about using our cloning and genetic engineering technology to wipe out every problem which faces society.

Jason Eiseman

Let's start with racism. The problem is that the world is a very diverse place. There are people from all over the world who look, talk and act differently. There are different ethnicities everywhere and this has created a huge problem.

First, we must use genetic engineering so everyone looks exactly the same. No more different colors, different ethnicities, everyone should look exactly alike. But what color should everyone's skin be? I think we must go with a color that is not found anywhere, like green or purple, that way there can be no fighting about what color everyone will be. Once everyone looks exactly the same there will be no more racism.

Because we are using genetic engineering we can create perfect beings in a factory, a baby factory. But people must still have sexual contact with each other in order to be kept content and busy.

But to make sex most satisfying and to keep people as happy as possible we must make each person as attractive as possible to the opposite sex.

First, every man must be slender, but also muscular. All men will be designed to have perfect abs, and every man will have a 10-inch penis. They must be tall as well, about 6'3", and as I mentioned before, they will have the perfect body, no fat at all.

We will genetically engineer every woman to be 5'9", 120 pounds, with long legs, and a double D bra size. Of course, the women will be engineered so they are without any fat, as well. This will also eliminate anorexia and bulimia. There will be no need for breast augmentation since every woman will have big breasts.

But that doesn't solve the problem of sexism. Forget making everyone attractive. If we truly want to end sexism, we have to eliminate different genders. We must make a unisex being, an asexual creature. Then not only will have everyone be the same color, everyone will be the same sex as well. No man, no woman, a hermaphroditic species.

But wait... people will still think very differently, and this could be a problem. I suggest we take every child, at a very early age, and put them through a sort of military training. We will condition them to be of one mind and one purpose. Once they grow older they will all think exactly the same, and there will be no divisions between people who disagree on certain issues. If people all think the same there will be no more partisan politics, or needless litigation.

But wait a minute, there will still be classism. There will still be rich and poor, but paying people the same wages or salaries will not solve that problem, we'll have to make sure that everyone also receives the same possessions. Everyone will have the same car, the same house — every possession people can have as symbols of money and power will be exactly the same. It will eliminate greed, it will eliminate people's dependence on money. Classism will disappear.

That's still not enough, though. Everything must be exactly the same, exactly the same. We can not stop at looks and the status symbols I mentioned before; there is so much more that needs to be made perfectly equal.

Everyone must have the same eye color, same clothes, same sperm count, same periods of menstruation, same marriage age, same wedding, same underwear, same rugs...

There can be no differences, because differences are what separate us. We must all play the same sport, and watch the same sport, we must all read the same newspaper, watch the same television channel and eat the same food.

If that's not Utopia, I don't know what is. What could be better? If everyone was the same then there would be no problems. We would all be of one mind, one body, one spirit.

Jason Eiseman is a Collegian staff member.

Letters to the Editor

Response to GEO slander

To the editor:

I was shocked that when I decided to look up my home University's newspaper over the web, I was met with such an "asinine" and insipid letter as that of Mr. Gary Mendese (Collegian, March 25).

In the letter to which I have made reference, there is a great deal of umbrage and unnecessary slander involved. If not directly, then at least in spirit, towards an organization which, by all other means, is merely trying to support those who are trying to do their jobs and survive.

The facts speak for themselves here; the current salary for a graduate student teaching assistant are little over $6,000, taxes removed. I would suggest that anyone wishing to claim that that pittance is enough money to live on for a year try it before openly proclaiming themselves fools. In today's society, $10,000 is looked upon as a bare minimum, and is not even considered to be a reasonable sum. The only means to survival, in any sort of modern living style, then, is to get married or to work two jobs.

To insist upon the necessity of the first would be a ridiculous assertion, one to which the various issue groups all over campus would immediately instigate an uprising were such a claim supported and/or socially coerced. The only valid path, then, is to work two jobs.

The workload in graduate school is sufficient to allow for the sentiment that a part time job should be the only form of work necessary to maintain a proper living style. The average TA position works "20 hours per week." The first problem is that this is only the purest form of fiction; the average TA works at least 30 hours per week, and receives the pay of 2/3 that time. Some work even more, and anyone who has been at school for almost two years can easily tell that any excessive time spent outside of school work results in only one thing: a lowering of grades. In graduate school, there isn't nearly the same kind of leeway as there is in undergraduate school.

All of this put together, perhaps, will bring the GFO into a slightly better focus for everyone who opposes them so distinctly. In today's world, little can be done anymore, for the average person, without obtaining at least a Master's degree. Don't be so anxious to cut the tree branch before discovering you might have to stand on it later.

Sean Murphy
UMass Student Abroad

Against protesting activism

To the editor:

Elsa Allen covered a gamut of issues in her contribution to the Collegian (March 23), making quite a task of determining where to begin my response. First of all, I wonder exactly how "protesting activism" works. Does it involve actively voicing your opinion against actively voicing your opinion? If everyone wrote such letters of concern, the world to the activist would really be a better place. The purpose of activism is not to oppress or even offend other ideologies but to question whether people are satisfied with the conditions that some of us consider unacceptable. If you choose apathy, that is your choice. However, please do not be affronted when someone attempts to offer you intelligent discussion regarding the state of things.

The author's point that many of us have little or no time for activism is granted, but the fact remains that there are people who do feel that education entails not only over-priced books, TI-85s and No. 2 pencils, but also other extracurricular amusements, including active participation in society. Perhaps the author should have considered at least a less animistic standpoint against activism. She complains that nobody addresses her in an "intellectual manner," which is why she is apathetic. If she is looking for intelligent conversation, then what is the argument against petitioning?

In the end, I am left confused by the "real issues" that the author deems worthy of activism. The article would have been clearer had it focused on either the author's self-professed apathy or some better-defined standards that might measure the "reality" of an issue, preferably more specific than something "equivalent to the Vietnam War." Everyone's issues are of relative importance. The few thousands of children who starve to death each day in the world are assumably not concerned with preserving our right to drink beer on campus. The point is that by nature, people will fight for what they need or believe in. If one is led to believe in nothing, then I suppose one will fight for nothing.

SGA needs to inform students

To the editor:

After reading Jill Carroll's articles in the March 12 and 13 issues of the Collegian, and after hearing comments around campus, I have decided that students need to be made fully aware of the events which took place during the March 11 Undergraduate Senate meeting. My observations, as a senator, of the events both proceeding and during the meeting in question are as follows:

First, the Student Judiciary became short on members when the Chief Justice resigned. This was announced during a Senate meeting prior to the election. It is the SGA's responsibility (to students) to make sure this branch of the student government can be run effectively. It is not possible for the Student Judiciary to do its job when there are not enough members.

Second, a student who had shown interest in the Student Judiciary was contacted. This all took place before the election results were announced. The candidate then went before the coordinating council committee where members unanimously agreed he was an excellent candidate for the Student Judiciary.

Third, at the senate meeting on March 11, three attempts were made to put a motion to appoint this student to the Student Judiciary on the agenda. All three attempts failed. The motion that failed was only to allow the appointee to be considered, not to appoint him. If it had passed, the appointee would have been able to explain his reasons for wanting to join the Student Judiciary, as well as answer questions from any senator. Next, the appointee would have been debated on by senators.

Senators who voted against this motion on March 11, were in fact voting against allowing a student to speak; a student who is part of the community they claim to represent. The reason they voted this way was that they believed the appointee would align himself with the so-called "enemy" and rule their friend's presidency invalid. They did this without allowing the appointee to speak to prove his motives were different from what they believed. Is this the way students on campus should be represented? I'm not saying that these senators should have voted to appoint this student to the Student Judiciary, but they should have at least heard what he had to say.

During my three years as a senator in the Student Government Association (SGA), I have seen relations in the senate go from bad to worse. Students on this campus mock the Senate and senators don't understand why. The reason is that senators have forgotten the real reason they should be in Senate and have instead used the meetings for political games. It's time that every senator is reminded that their main responsibility as a senator is to represent students.

The things I carry

Author Tim O'Brien once wrote a story called "The Things They Carried" for Esquire magazine. In this story, he defined his characters, not by their appearances, but by what they carried around with them. One guy carried a sling shot, another carried sun tan lotion, a third carried M&M's and so on. This method of description really told a lot about the characters.

Eric Petersen

So I was reading this story, and I got curious. What exactly did I have in my pockets, and what did they say about me? I turned my pockets out onto the desk to find out. I would almost recommend this activity to anyone, except that what I found out is that I'm incredibly boring. All I had a was a piece of paper with blurred blue ink on it in my left hip pocket, so I guess I learned that I have to check my pockets before putting my jeans in the wash.

When I pulled out my wallet, I learned that I was broke and would not be eating dinner.

Actually, I did find two things that do say some things about me. I'm just not sure what.

The first thing is this dollar bill I carry around in my wallet all the time. I never spend it; I like it too much. I can tell it from any other bill because it says "Happy Birthday" in red marker on the top margin. Actually, it's pink marker, but I think the bill's been through the washer a time or two. It's not a good luck charm, though. Not really. See, I got it one year on my birthday. I walked into a store, picked something up, paid for it and my change came to $1 exactly. The cashier handed me this dollar that just happened to say "Happy Birthday" on it.

I looked close at the cashier to see if somehow he knew it was my birthday, but it was just a coincidence that I received that specific dollar on that specific day. Now it makes me smile every time I see it there in my wallet. Coincidence was on my side the day I got that dollar, and I figure coincidence will stay with me as long as I have it. In fact, if that's the only money I have in my wallet, I count myself as broke — it wouldn't even occur to me to use that dollar. I would be starving to death, and I wouldn't use that dollar to buy food. I've got this feeling that if I did, I'd die of food poisoning soon after. Not because I got rid of the dollar, of course. Just a coincidence.

The second thing I found in my pocket is this smooshed up penny with a message on it. My girlfriend, Melissa, gave it to me a while back. She had put it in one of those machines you sometimes find at tourist attractions. You put in a penny and turn the crank on the side of the machine. As you turn the crank, your penny gets, well, smooshed between these two cylinders, and some kind of message gets printed on one side. Some of the messages I've seen are "The Grand Canyon" or "The Man on The Mountain, Laconia New Hampshire," things like that. This one says, "Good for one hug and a kiss, anytime, anywhere."

It's cheesy, I know, but I like it. Ever since then, all I have to do is hand it to Melissa, and I get a hug and a kiss, anytime, anywhere. She's not a big fan of Public Displays of Affection, so I take a sadistic pleasure in handing her the penny in all kinds of crowded places: malls, bus terminals and churches.

Anyway, I keep the thing on me even when she's not around. I keep it in that little secret pocket inside the right hip pocket on blue jeans. Melissa and I have to spend a lot of time away from each other. I'm in Massachusetts; she's in Connecticut. I have school; she has her job. You know how it is. So I like having the penny with me. Every time I reach in my pocket, I feel it in the secret pocket and think of her.

Sometimes I'll take it out and roll it around in my hand while I'm doing something else, like talking to someone. I'll rub my thumb over the one side, feel how smooth it is. Then I'll rub my thumb over the printed side, feel the bumps of each letter. Sometimes, I'll kiss it, like for good luck, or I'll talk to it as if it were Melissa. Then I'll coo to it. Then... then I notice the person I was talking to is looking at me funny, so I put it away.

Another girl group hits U.S. soil

ALL SAINTS
All Saints
London/Polygram

Upon first glance, this all-female vocal quartet looks as if they're the Spice Girls without the clever nicknames. There's no "Sporty" or "Baby" in All Saints. The girls — Shaznay, Melanie, Nicky and Natalie — simply go by their own monikers. How boring! It's too bad because what this group lacks (among many things) is a definitive identity.

Songs like "Trapped" and "Lady Marmalade" are pure fluff and drift off into thin air. There's simply nothing about All Saints that remains with the listener. The songs are all highly listenable, but utterly forgettable. They range from pleasantly watered-down soul, "I Know Where It's At," to the insipid — a cover of the Red Hot Chili Peppers "Under The Bridge" is among the worst covers I've ever heard.

The dozen songs on their self-titled debut are each immaculately constructed and produced pop songs, which contributes to the album coming off slicker than the Exxon Valdez. Why Nellee Hooper (Madonna, Bjork, Janet Jackson) and Cameron McKee (Neneh Cherry, Massive Attack) chose to get involved with All Saints probably has a lot to do with the almighty dollar.

With such lightweight fluff material, I'm sure they'll be huge within two months. They're already rivalling the illustrious Spice Girls for chart supremacy in Europe and have several top 10 singles out across the pond.

Give them a little credit, though, they at least (claim to) write their own material. Come to think of it, maybe that's why All Saints are all wet. Ladies, take a cue from the Spice Girls and leave the important stuff to somebody with talent. Stick to looking pretty for the camera. C-

LIFE IN THE SO-CALLED SPACE AGE
God Lives Underwater
A&M/1500

The first few tracks from God Lives Underwater's second major label release, Life in the So-Called Space Age, are, for the most part, insipid. But before you classify this album as cheesy industrial-pop, keep listening.

The best material from the disc comes approximately mid- way through its 11 tracks. Songs like "Alone Again" and "Medicated to the One I Love" are hugely entertaining. Other songs, such as "Behavior Modification," may have you thinking that your stereo is broken.

Life in the So-Called Space Age is a decent, but inconsistent, album. Whether you find in dreadful or delightful, it will make you be thankful for the "track skip" feature on your CD player. B-

ALL THE PAIN MONEY CAN BUY
Fastball
Hollywood

I actually heard a disc jockey on some nameless alternative station in Connecticut bad mouthing the Fastball single, "The Way." That's how bad it is. You don't usually hear those wacky guys badmouthing the merchandise, but this guy was, and he had every right to.

"The Way" is actually low rent. Sublime, which in itself was just plain old low rent. Some canned backbeat and Mexican flourishes are old hat on the radio these days and this song does nothing to enliven whatever genre it falls under. Although it's bound to be a hit, that doesn't exactly make it any good.

A good amount of the album is actually low rent something or other, from some really bad Skynyrd ("Better Than It Was") to some bad Matthew Sweet ("Which Way To The Top?" which features guest vocals by Poe — but why?).

Although some tracks show promise ("Fire Escape"), even those have grooves that are driven into the ground by repetition. One or two tracks escape with a good idea or two, or at least rock a bit, but even those will escape your mind given time. C (Mike Messaros)

MEET THE DEEDLES
Original Motion Picture Soundtrack
Mercury

Meet The Deedles looks like a big steaming crap of a movie. Something about two brothers being "rad" (swear to God, they say it in the trailer, It's not me), working at Yellowstone National Park, falling in love. Hijinks ensue.

What a surprise then, that the soundtrack is not half bad. It's a little less than good, though, in case you've forgotten your fractions.

This soundtrack is basically wall to wall ska. Your opinion of the album will be influenced thusly. The disc starts out with a Mighty Mighty Bosstones slow jam, which seems to have been left off their last album because it sounds too much like "Another Drinking Song." Things do pick up with Dance Hall Crashers' "Lady Luck." The inclusion of Hepcat's cool old school ska gets points in my book. The best track on the album is by Homie, which has three members of Weezer in it. Their "American Girls" is the sweetest plum on this album by far and, surprise, it is not ska.

On the other hand, there is no need for Goldfinger. Ever. Gary Hoey's "Psycho Gremmie" is an unneeded surf-rock meets Yngwie Malmstein number. Perfect Thyroid covers the Hawaii Five-O theme for no good reason.

Take this album with a grain of salt readers. Like most soundtracks, it's a mixed bag. B- (M.M.)

Sweet Honey to "rock" Smith

COURTESY SHARON FARMER

The Grammy-winning a capella group Sweet Honey In the Rock performs at Smith College tonight at 8 p.m.

By Joe Sullivan
Collegian Staff

Grammy award-winning African-American a capella group Sweet Honey In The Rock brings its vocal stylings to Smith College's John M. Greene Hall tonight at 8 p.m.

Sweet Honey's musical repertoire is varied, covering the folk, gospel, jazz and blues music of America, as well as the tribal music of the African continent.

Since forming in 1973 via Bernice Johnson Reagon's vocal workshop at the Washington, D.C. Repertory Company, the five-woman group has boasted 22 different members and 14 recordings to its credit. The current lineup includes Bernice Johnson Reagon, Yaaye Maria Barnwell, Nitanju Bolade Casel, Aisha Kahlil, Carol Maillard and Sign Language interpreter Shirley Childress Johnson.

In 1989, the group won a Grammy Award for its contributions to the Smithsonian Folkways/Columbia release, Vision Shared: A Tribute To Woody Guthrie And Leadbelly, and in 1993 and 1994, the ensemble received top awards from CASA, the Contemporary A Capella Society of America.

The summer of 1996 saw Sweet Hones touring Australia for the fifth time, recording "And When I Die" for a Laura Nyro compilation, and visiting New Zealand for the first time. Last year, the group stayed busy developing new material for a possible release in 1998, singing and giving workshops in urban centers and communities throughout North America, contributing to a Pete Seeger tribute anthology and releasing their own two-CD compilation, Selections 1976-1988.

Selections is a fine introduction to the music of Sweet Honey and also the individual group members through extensive biographical information in the liner notes. The set captures the varied types of music the group has been known to delve into over the years, while also displaying its message of humanity and social justice.

Sweet Honey's vibe is well-displayed on their version of the spiritual, "Wade In The Water," performed with hauntingly unreal harmonies and a slower pace for added solemnity. Other highlights from the compilation are the biographical "Fannie Lou Hamer," the mournful "Sometime," the West African funeral song "Meyango," and the tale of a

HOME TRUTHS FROM ABROAD
Fretblanket
Polydor

Yet another British-grown band is brought onto the American alternative rock scene. Their first CD Junkfuel was introduced a few years ago, but did not receive the praise their current release, Home Truths From Abroad, is receiving. Their recent re-appearance to the music scene has been widely noticed. Fretblank was voted number one on MTV's "12 Angry Viewers" awards.

My first impression of these guys was they were just another British band. But, as I continued to listen to the CD, I began to enjoy it more and more. It wasn't the lyrics that got me, they seem to be more of a filler than the main attraction on their record. Their musical talent is what made me keep on listening.

The CD starts off with three fast and upbeat songs including "Into the Ocean." They then slow down to a more personal level with "Killer in a Former Life." This breaks the CD up a bit, gives it a change of pace. The rest of the CD continues to be upbeat and fun. It ends of on a wistful note with "Me and the Stars."

This CD creates a good new alternative sound. In some aspects they sound just like the rest of the alternative field, but I enjoyed it a lot more. It's not soft, but certainly not as noisy as some musicians these days. Fretblanket is certainly a grout to give a chance and see what else they can come up with. B+ (Gena Mavuli)

Wildcat scandal stuns Final Four

By Paul A. Driscoll
Associated Press

CHICAGO — On the eve of college basketball's showcase event, the sport was rocked again yesterday by a point-shaving scandal, this time at Northwestern — a school known more for brains than betting lines.

Federal indictments charged former Wildcat players Kenneth Dion Lee and Dewey Williams — both starters at the time — and two others with fixing the outcome of three basketball games during the 1994-95 season.

A former Wildcat football player was accused in a separate indictment of running a bookmaking operation on the Northwestern campus.

It was the latest in a string of gambling schemes involving college basketball players since the point-shaving scandal of 1951, which involved schools such as Kentucky, CCNY and NYU. And it came when the spotlight on college basketball was brightest — two days before the Final Four in San Antonio.

"It's a bomb ready to explode. It can happen to anybody," Duke coach Mike Krzyzewski said yesterday from San Antonio. "You wouldn't even know about it until it happened."

And it happened at Northwestern, just like the point-shaving scandals at Arizona State and Tulane. Two years ago, 13 Boston College football players were suspended for betting on college and pro football and major league baseball games.

"Unfortunately, student-athletes are vulnerable to the temptations and pressures associated with gambling and greed," U.S. Attorney Scott Lassar said. "That, however, does not condone unlawful conduct."

Lee and Williams were charged with point-shaving, while Kevin Pendergast and Brian Irving were charged with conspiring to fix the outcome of three games in the '94-95 season — at home against Wisconsin and Penn State, and on the road against Michigan. The Wildcats lost each by at least 14 points and failed to cover the pointspread against the Badgers and Nittany Lions. Northwestern finished the season 5-22 under coach Ricky Byrdsong.

Lee, a senior guard, was suspended by the school for six games during the '94-95 season for betting on football games not involving Northwestern, prosecutors said. They charged that it was only weeks after his return to the team that he began the conspiracy to shave points.

"We were all shocked that after his suspension for gambling he is involved in point shaving," Lassar said.

Pendergast and Irving also were charged with conspiring to fix the games to ensure the success of bets.

Former football player Brian Ballerini was charged with accepting bets on sporting events from other Northwestern athletes, including Lee. The charges against Ballerini include an allegation that he threatened Lee would be harmed if he did not pay a gambling debt.

Rick Taylor, Northwestern's athletic director, said the school learned early yesterday of the point-shaving allegations.

At a news conference with the U.S. attorney, Taylor said point-shaving "purely and simply is betrayal. Betrayal of self, teammate, family, coaches, university and the very game itself."

William Saum, an NCAA gambling specialist, said he believes illegal sports betting is a problem "on virtually every college campus in America."

Taylor said he did not expect the NCAA to issue any sanctions against Northwestern.

Lassar said the Northwestern investigation began when university officials turned over results of their own investigation into campus gambling by student athletes. He said the university had cooperated fully.

Lassar said Ballerini and Lee were cooperating with prosecutors and were expected to plead guilty.

The games in question occurred on Feb. 15, Feb. 22 and March 1, 1995. In the first game, in which Wisconsin was favored by 13 1/2 points, the Badgers beat Northwestern 70-56 after trailing 28-21 at the half.

In the next game, Penn State was favored by 14 points and won 89-59; and in the third, Michigan was favored by 25 1/2 points and won 81-64.

The government said Pendergast paid Lee $4,000 to fix the Penn State game. Prosecutors would not say how much more was involved in the alleged payoffs, other than the players got nothing for the Michigan game because they failed to beat the pointspread. The government said $20,000 was wagered on that game by the two accused gamblers, but would no say how much more money was involved.

Utah is dark horse of the Final Four

By Robert Gehrke
Associated Press

SALT LAKE CITY — The flu could do what Arizona couldn't: stop Utah.

Andre Miller, Utah's point guard who put up a triple-double against Arizona, reserve point guard Jordie McTavish and backup guard David Jackson all complained of flu symptoms after Monday's workout.

Utah coach Rick Majerus said Tuesday that McTavish left practice early Monday, but Miller had a great practice and Majerus hadn't heard he was ill.

Both Miller and Jackson were at a pep rally for the team Tuesday night. Miller said later that he has a little bit of a sore throat, but it is not going to keep him out of the game Saturday and he does not expect it to affect his play against North Carolina in the national semifinals.

During a news conference Tuesday, Majerus deflected the bulk of the questions to his players. He sat at the end of the table scribbling plays on the back of a news release, tearing them into little squares and putting them in a pile.

This is Majerus's basketball mind at work — and his mind is always at work.

"I just want to get out of here and go watch more film," the coach said. His coaches were watching film of North Carolina right up until the pep rally.

Majerus has a winning percentage of .783 at Utah and has led his team to six NCAA tournament appearances, including two trips to the Sweet 16 and, last year, a trip to the West Regional finals.

This year, he's guided a team of relatively unheralded players into the Final Four, the first time since 1966 the Utes have advanced that far.

Credit Majerus's knack for finding recruits where others aren't looking. Indeed, few gave the Utes (29-3) much of a chance to advance deep into the NCAA tournament after losing last year's star, Keith Van Horn, to the NBA.

Majerus's search has taken him to Finland, where he turned up Hanno Mottola. He found Michael Doleac when Utah's big man wasn't starting for his high school team in Oregon. And he locked up Utah's biggest high school players, Drew Hansen and Alex Jensen. Miller, academically ineligible his first year at Utah, was the Utes' most sought-after recruit among Utah's starters.

"I was always so bad that all I could do was improve," Doleac said.

Majerus saw potential in Doleac and others, and his team gelled at the right time, knocking off Arkansas, West Virginia and defending champion Arizona.

Utah's players credit Majerus' coaching and uncompromising work-ethic for the team's unexpected success.

"He works very hard every day and he demands 100 percent from his players," Doleac said. "You don't have a practice where you dog it."

Mottola said the hours that Majerus and his assistants spend in the film room studying the team's opponents gives the team an edge. "We spend so much time preparing for games ... so we know pretty much what we're going to do going in," Mottola said. Tomorrow's game could hinge on defense.

North Carolina (34-3) has held opponents to 38.3 percent shooting, and only allowed one team, Maryland, better than 50 percent for a game — one the Tar Heels lost in overtime.

Likewise, Utah has held opponents to 38.2 percent shooting and has not allowed an opponent to shoot better than 50 percent from the field all season. In Utah's four tournament games, opponents have shot below 39 percent.

The Utes play almost exclusively man-to-man defense, with the notable exception of the very successful "triangle-and-two" Majerus used to smother Arizona.

"Our whole philosophy is get hand up on every shooter, don't let them fast break, don't let them get a second shot," Majerus said.

Not giving up a second shot means rebounding, and Utah's 10.2 average rebounding margin against its opponents is the largest in the nation.

UNC will fight fire with fire in semifinal

By David Droschak
Associated Press

CHAPEL HILL, N.C. — Offense grabs headlines, defense wins championships.

Those words were spoken this week by All-American Antawn Jamison, who hopes the No. 1 North Carolina Tar Heels can continue to play strong defense in the national semifinals against Utah tomorrow.

While the Utes stunned college basketball last Saturday by using a triangle-and-two defense to shut down defending champion Arizona in the West Regional, the Tar Heels added to their own defensive resume on the opposite coast.

Through 37 games, North Carolina has limited opponents to 38 percent shooting — the lowest since the 1959-60 season. That mark has dropped even more (35 percent) in four NCAA tournament games.

"We know deep down inside that our offense can disappear just like that," Jamison said. "There will be a time when we're not shooting 55 percent, and that's when we really need to rely on our defense."

Jamison pointed to last year's national semifinal loss to eventual NCAA champion Arizona as a time when the offense dried up and more defense was needed.

"If we had the same defensive intensity last year as this year, it probably would have been a different story," he said.

Only one team — Maryland in its overtime win on Jan. 14 — has shot better than 50 percent against the Tar Heels (34-3) this season. Nineteen teams haven't cracked 40 percent, including Michigan State and Connecticut in the East Regional semifinals and finals in Greensboro.

"Our defense really has become a factor," coach Bill Guthridge said.

It is not the typical defense seen under coach Dean Smith for most of the '70s and '80s, a trapping style that would often fluster guards into turnovers as they crossed midcourt.

"We are trying to build on the same defense that Dean went to in January of last year," Guthridge said. "In a way it's not the typical Carolina defense in that it's not the pressure that we would like to have. But it has been good to us."

The Tar Heels also confuse opponents with their interchangeable parts.

woman's plight, "Mae Frances," but every song is well-done and has a message that should be taken to heart.

Each member of the group has her own personality which is apparent at different points, depending on the song, and together they deal eloquently with issues such as being a black woman in America, the history of oppression in both this country and African nations such as South Africa, and the struggle to keep up the fight for justice to maintain the hope for a better future.

The themes contained within Sweet Honey's music combined with the group's phenomenal musical talent makes for an outstanding package worth viewing live.

Horoscopes

ARIES (March 21–April 19) — There may be evidence today that what you say and do does indeed have an impact on those around you. Confidence is on the rise.

TAURUS (April 20–May 20) — You might hear from someone who is feeling a little left out today. You can do much to reassure him or her that you're not forgetting!

GEMINI (May 21–June 20) — You may not know what today's decisions will bring about in the long run, but there's every indication that short-term gains will be made.

CANCER (June 21–July 22) — Progress may be difficult to assess today. It is OK to take your time and figure out what your status is.

LEO (July 23–Aug. 22) — While others gravitate toward those things that will quickly be forgotten, you are best to focus your energies on long-term items today.

VIRGO (Aug. 23–Sept. 22) — Take care that you don't fall victim to your own deception today. Your best bet is to avoid any kind of falsehood at this time.

LIBRA (Sept. 23–Oct. 22) — What you are doing is understandable, but that doesn't mean that others aren't going to try and talk you out of continuing this way.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23–Nov. 21) — You are going to be in a position of some authority today, whether you know it or not. The best thing you can do is listen to another's concerns.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22–Dec. 21) — Self-promotion proves a tricky task today. Others may be suspicious of any attempt to put yourself front and center. Be subtle, easy-going.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22–Jan. 19) — You will receive an important and timely affirmation before the day is out. It is a good day to begin putting a new plan into motion slowly.

AQUARIUS (Jan 20.–Feb. 18) — With the help of a friend, you should be able to dig your way out of a tough situation that came upon you quite suddenly only yesterday.

PISCES (Feb 19–March 20) — Focus on what you can readily identify today. This is no time to get caught up in issues that appear to have no definite answers.

Men's tennis prepared for possible confidence boost

By Sanford Appell
Collegian Staff

After a disappointing southern trip featuring three losses, the Massachusetts men's tennis team reloaded with a grueling training session in Florida over spring break.

This preparation leads up to this weekend's action, which involves two key home matches at the Bay Road Tennis Club.

UMass (2–4 spring, 8–5 overall), will take on Atlantic 10 rival Fordham this afternoon, before meeting Colgate tomorrow at noon.

"There is no question that this is a big weekend for the team," coach Judy Dixon said. "We need to turn the momentum of this season back in our favor, before it is too late."

As Dixon has stressed to her team all season, the inter– conferences matches, such as the Fordham affair weigh so heavily in regards to the Atlantic 10 tournament.

Furthermore, Colgate has squared off with several A–10 teams this season, which also will play a role in terms of the seedings.

"Both matches are so important to our overall outlook," Dixon said. "I expect to have good results against Fordham, but Colgate has been especially tough on us."

The Minutemen are 0–2 against Colgate, having fallen to the Red Raiders in 1995 and 1996.

Number one singles player Todd Cheney is fully recovered from a bout with bronchitis, and Dixon expects him to lead the charge this weekend.

Another player to watch will be sophomore Parsa Samii, who has been moved up a spot to No. 4 in the singles rotation.

Samii has been effective all spring, sporting a team best 8– 2 overall spring record. He posted the lone singles victory for UMass against George Washington earlier this month.

Despite an extended team slump — UMass has dropped 4 straight matches — the team morale is upbeat.

"We know we have been playing tough opponents," junior Rob Manchester said. "We competed well for the most part, and we have been preparing hard for the stretch run. Hopefully we can turn this around now."

The Minutemen have overcome tremendous amounts of adversity over the past few seasons, so Dixon feels the current situation is not a cause for great concern.

"We wanted to play better teams, and we are now getting a taste for what the next level of competition is all about," Dixon said. "I am confident that this group of guys can rebound and be tough to beat by the end of this season."

"The team needs to win now," Manchester said. "Mentally and physically we are ready, but winning a few matches, will boost our confidence all the way back up."

"[UVA] has the strongest schedule of any crew team in the country," Dietz said. "I also think we are racing them at a disadvantage this early in the season. We're facing a team that finished fourth in the country last year with a bad race in the Championships. Right off the bat, we're getting thrown into the fire."

Although UMass' women's crew program ranks amongst the nation's elite, Dietz admits that his pupils may face some stiff competition within the A–10. If the Minutewomen hope to capture their third conference crown in the as many seasons, they will have to contend with potential spoilers George Washington and Temple. Rhode Island and Fordham are also expected to be competitive.

In addition to his pride in the strong UMass varsity eight crew, Dietz is extremely pleased with both the progress and potential of his first novice team, whose bright future has him floating.

"This year's first novice team is the fastest I've had since I've been here," he said. "That's your life blood."

After hosting their opening race, the Minutewomen will be on the road until May 9, when they are slated to partake in the State School Regatta on their home water.

The Massachusetts softball team will kick off its Atlantic 10 conference slate this weekend with games against La Salle and Fordham.

Stanford excels in class, on the field

By Steve Wilstein
Associated Press

SAN ANTONIO — When Jeff Tarango threw a tantrum that got him kicked out of Wimbledon a few years ago, a British tabloid noted he had played for Stanford and wondered if everyone from the school was a little crazy.

The answer, in a way, is yes. Crazy about competition. In the classrooms, on the courts, in the fields.

Stanford is the home of winners. Nobel Prizes. Pulitzer Prizes. Olympic medals. NCAA championships. John McEnroe. Tiger Woods. The men's basketball team that plays in the Final Four against Kentucky tomorrow is every bit part of a work-hard, play-hard attitude that enables Stanford to reign, virtually year after year, as one of the nation's top sports schools.

With a sports budget of more than $30 million a year, this private university draws athletes from a relatively tiny student population compared with North Carolina, UCLA, Penn State and other perennial basketball or football powerhouses.

But the lack of prominence in basketball and football — Stanford last reached the Final Four in 1942 and last played in the Rose Bowl in 1972 — obscures the fact that it wins in so many other sports.

Stanford won six NCAA championships last year — men's and women's tennis, men's and women's volleyball, and men's and women's cross country. It also had three runners-up, three third-place finishes, 16 teams in the top five, 19 in the top 10, and 25 in the top 20.

So far this year, Stanford has won three NCAA titles. No school has won more NCAA team championships than Stanford over the last five years (21), 10 years (36) and 15 years (48).

In the five years that the Sears Directors Cup has been awarded to the top U.S. athletic program, Stanford has won it four times, including the last three. North Carolina, one of the finest state schools academically, won it once. This year, Stanford will win it again.

Stanford's 81 national championships include 16 in men's tennis, 10 in women's tennis, nine in men's water polo, nine in women's swimming, seven in men's swimming, and seven in men's golf. At first glance, the school looks laid-back. Towering palm trees shade the main drive into the campus. Vast lawns serve as carpets for students studying under the sun or tossing Frisbees. Neat flower beds surround Rodin sculptures. Rolling hills, green as Ireland in the wet winters and brown the rest of the year, offer a bucolic backdrop to the low, red tile-roofed Spanish style quads. In elegant Palo Alto, about halfway between San Francisco and San Jose, Stanford's workaholic scientists and entrepreneurs spawned the companies that evolved into Silicon Valley. The university, along with rival California across the bay in Berkeley, continues to generate the talent and nonstop working atmosphere that make Silicon Valley so successful.

That same attitude translates to success in sports.

"By nature, we have motivated athletes who are used to competing in the classroom and in sports," assistant athletic director Gary Migdol said. "It's a special kind of student who comes here. He or she has a penchant to improve and excel. "We have more Olympians than anyone else (49 athletes and coaches at the Atlanta Games) and the success at the NCAA championships feeds on itself. The baseball and tennis teams win, so the swimming team wants to win, and the basketball teams and the volleyball teams. There are just a lot of champions walking around this campus."

Wins, confidence boost water polo for weekend trip

By Paul Teves
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts women's water polo team heads to Hanover, N.H., on Saturday for the Collegiate Water Polo Association League Tournament. No. 7 UMass hopes to continue building off the success of its recent California road swing.

The Minutewomen came home on Monday after a solid nine–game road swing, during which they won six games. The crowning achievement of the trip was the championship performance at the week–ending Claremont Invitational.

"Our confidence level increased as the week went on, because we new that we were so close to beating teams like USC, and in the end we did," Minutewomen coach Dan McOsker said.

UMass started the tournament by beating Whittier College for the second time in the week, 12–0. Sarah Newell scored three goals, while Katie Grogan, Barbara Hickey, Claudia Clement and Marcie Hupp all chipped in with two goals each.

UMass then gained even more confidence when it defeated the Redlands, 8–2, and followed with a win over No. 10 UC San Diego, 8–2. All American Katie Grogan came up big again with five goals in these two games, and Andrea Vazquez had three as well. But the key to these victories were the all–around performances as many different players contributed to these two wins.

"The reason so many different players were scoring is because they were in a position to score, but it was the work of the seven players as a unit that got these results," McOsker said.

UMass headed to the championship game against Southern California, which had beaten the Minutewomen earlier in the week on a outstanding performance by USC goalie Beatrice Ortiz. But after this game every one would be talking about Peggy Nieves.

UMass received five goals each time they played the Trojans, but this time Nieves came up with eight big saves. UMass won easily, 5–2.

"Nieves came up big, she seemed to just get stronger as the week went on," McOsker said.

After the solid finish in California, No. 7 UMass would return with a 12–3. They now head to New Hampshire to take on Wesleyan, Brown and Dartmouth.

"Now we can take what we have seen in California and work on it for the next four or five weeks before we head back for Nationals," McOsker said.

The Minutewomen learned a lot in California, more than holding their own against some of the nation's top competition.

"The players learned to play as a unit, they learned to believe in each other and trust each other and understand that we can beat anyone if we believe that a teammate will be there to help," McOsker said about the team's trust in each other on the West coast.

As a result, the team has made a commitment to their offense and defensive play in preparation for Nationals. The competition for the remainder of the season pales in comparison to the teams in the West, leaving UMass to work on its game without the upper level opposition.

"Every game is important, and we will use every game as a stepping stone for the Nationals, and if we believe in each other and work as a group we will be able to be successful this weekend," McOsker said.

UM men's lacrosse ready to do battle against Cadets

By Brett Mauser
Collegian Staff

The phrase "opposites attract" probably is more associated with love, but tomorrow at 2 p.m. at Richard F. Garber Field, the world of lacrosse will get an in-depth look at it really means. The No. 8 Massachusetts men's lacrosse team (5-0) will be playing the numbers when it takes on the No. 20 Army Cadets (4-2).

The game will be broadcast on WMUA-FM (91.1) with a pre-game show starting at 1:45 p.m.

It will be strength vs. strength, weakness vs. weakness as graduation has riddled both of the teams, but on different ends of the field. The Minutemen lost five out of their top six goal scorers, with senior Mike DelPercio the only one of the six remaining from last year's NCAA quarterfinalist team. Shots are flying against the Cadets, as three of last year's top defensemen were lost to graduation.

The last two times the Massachusetts men's lacrosse team has clashed with the Cadets, the games have been decided in the fourth period, with UMass outscoring Army, 20-19. The all-time series is knotted at nine.

"This is a game that we really want to get going into a tough stretch against Duke, Loyola and Harvard," UMass coach Greg Cannella said. "Traditionally, much like [Boston College], Army plays us tough every time we play."

The Minutemen come roaring into this contest headed by a strong defense. Going back to last season, UMass has not allowed an opposition double-digit scoring in 10 out of their last 11 games. Eventual national champion Princeton defeated the Minutemen 11-9 in the NCAA Tournament.

The Cadets are hot off a two-game winning streak and are looking to continue onto a seventh Patriot League title in eight years.

"Army is a very physical team who are not going to back down from us," Cannella said. "Any team in the Armed Forces is going to go out and try to push us around."

Much like last weekend's meeting with Hofstra, the focus moves to the senior goaltenders, this time around, UMass' John Kasselakis and Army's Lou Kousouris.

While Kasselakis makes his bid for All-America status, Kousouris, a pre-season honorable mention All-America, has been the savior of the otherwise porous Cadet defense. Holding opponents to 8.33 goals a game, Kousouris has needed to stop an average 16 shots on goal each day, and even made 23 saves in the 11-7 victory over Colgate. In combination with a rout of Bucknell, Kousouris went the equivalent of an entire game without letting up a goal.

"It might turn into a Greek battle, the both of them have been solid all year," Cannella said. "It could come down to the goalies because both are experienced and can control a game."

Despite returning its two top goal scorers in Jordon Gros and Chad Hadlock, the Cadet offense has struggled through six games, especially against the nation's top teams. Against Georgetown and Hobart, their only two defeats of the season, eight- and five-point losses, respectively, the offense sputtered, netting only 16 goals total.

UMass downs Crusaders 14–6; will face La Salle this weekend

By Michael Kobylanski
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts baseball team will open up its 1998 Atlantic 10 slate this weekend when it travels to Philadelphia for a three-game series with the Explorers of La Salle.

The Minutemen (7-5) are coming off a 14-6 win over Holy Cross yesterday afternoon in Worcester. UMass pounded out 18 hits against Crusader pitching to roll to victory in a game that was called after eight innings due to darkness.

Offensively, UMass' big guns stepped up their level of play once again versus Holy Cross. Junior co-captain Doug Clark was 4-for-5 with a home run, and also scored four runs and catcher Brian Samela also belted out four hits. Seniors Muchie Dagliere, who now has an 11-game hitting streak, and Pete Gautreau, the reigning A-10 Player of the Week, each pumped in two hits and four runs batted in.

La Salle struggled to a 19-27 mark last season, 8-12 in the A-10. This weekend's set, which features a doubleheader tomorrow at noon, and a single contest on Sunday at noon, will represent the first ever meetings between the Minutemen and the Explorers.

The hosts, who finished last in the A-10 Western Division in 1997, sport a 5-7 mark entering the weekend. The Explorers will be led by freshman Mike Bell, who leads the team with a .391 batting average thus far. No other La Salle starter will carry an average over .300 into the set against the Minutemen.

Junior Damian Derico anchors the Explorer pitching staff. The Woodbury, N.J., native is 1-0 with a 4.20 earned run average in three starts. Other hurlers who the Minutemen will probably see include senior Brian Mills, who also plays the outfield, Joe Fiorelli, Ryan Sylvander and Paul Blasetti. As a staff, La Salle has been struggling, and brings an ERA of 6.73 into the weekend.

On the UMass side of things, the contributions have been coming from all different directions. Gautreau leads the team with a .463 average, while Dagliere is hitting at a .444 clip with 21 RBI in 11 games. Steve Asadoorian boasts a .414 average heading into the weekend, and designated hitter Shaun Skeffington is at the .400 mark. Clark and Bryan Mazzaferro are also above the .300 plateau.

The pitching staff has also been holding off the opponents as of late, and will need to continue to come through this weekend.

Minutemen Notes: Dagliere became the school's all-time leader in hits in the victory over Providence on Tuesday. He now has 210 career hits... Ryan Hartman earned his first win of the year by hurling an inning against Holy Cross... Travis Veracka and Bill Cooke each have two wins apiece to lead the staff... Freshman Jason Grechika picked up his first collegiate save in the win over HC... The Minutemen have still yet to play a home game. The home opener will be Wednesday, April 1 vs. Siena.

Owls next up on tough women's lax slate

By Seth Koenig
Collegian Staff

After overcoming the natural elements to defeat its first two opponents, the Massachusetts women's lacrosse team suffered its first loss of the season under tame skies at the hands of Yale on Wednesday afternoon. That matchup kicked off an extremely tough three-game stretch early in the season, on that continues with Temple and Brown.

The Minutewomen face Temple tomorrow at 1 p.m. at Totman Field.

The loss, a seemingly solid victory for the Elis, was much closer than the 13-6 score indicated.

"It looks like a pretty healthy margin, but I don't know that the game really went that way," coach Francesca McClellan said of the Minutewomen's mid-week contest. "I was happy with the way we were playing. We had an excellent 23 minutes, but then we let down and let them go on a five-goal run. We left ourselves in a position where we couldn't catch up.

"The first 23 minutes, it was 3-3, and the last 20 minutes, it was 3-3. The middle of the game was where the difference was."

The mid-game slump could be perhaps traced indirectly to the weather the Minutewomen overcame to win their first two games. With the more familiar Totman Field taking longer to prepare for play, the team was forced to take its game to the AstroTurfed Richard F. Garber Field. Aside from a different surface, Garber has a smaller perimeter, leaving the Minutewomen less prepared for a wider field. Also, with their third scheduled game, against New Hampshire, postponed indefinitely, the squad missed out on valuable playing experience.

"Not to make excuses, but we've been playing on turf for a long time," McClellan said. "This was the first time in almost a month in which we played on grass, the last time being at [North Carolina]. Also, Yale's field was larger, so I think we got a little tired during the middle of the game."

Yale, whose 20–5 trouncing of UMass last year was compromised this time around by a significantly improved Minutewomen team, was only the tip of the iceberg. A difficult pair of games loom on the horizon, including this weekend against Temple, a NCAA Final Four participant in 1997.

"Temple is going to be obviously very competitive," McClellan said. "They have a few more games under their belt than we do, so they have a little more experience. They have a lot of talented players returning, as well. We will have to work on containing their fast break. Another strength of theirs is working around the crease, so that's also something we'll have to plan for."

Early last season, the Owls took advantage of the Minutewomen's inexperience between the pipes, clobbering UMass, 25-5. This year, the Carolyn Albright--and--Claudia Ovchinikoff-led Temple team will be firing at a talented pair of freshman Massachusetts goaltenders, Jen Nardi and Tara Durkin.

"Tara Durkin stepped in and had a great day [against Yale]," McClellan said. "Both goalies got time and I think that's really beneficial going into the weekend."

Looking to continue its past success, Massachusetts' crew races year's first

By Aaron M. Saykin

Three-time Olympic athlete. Two-time Olympic coach. Twenty two-year active member of the U.S. Olympic Committee. Twice the Atlantic 10 coach of the year in only three seasons.

These impressive credentials belong to fourth-year Massachusetts women's crew coach Jim Dietz, who, during his tenure at the helm of the Minutewoman rowers, has ignited the team to new heights, directing it to a second-place finish in the NCAA Rowing Championships last June.

Over nine months after finishing second in the nation, Dietz is confident that his UMass squad will remain atop the U.S. elite teams, despite the loss of three World Championship-caliber rowers to graduation.

"It'll be us or Brown [competing for the top spot]," Dietz said of his 1998 Minutewoman team, which may surprise a handful of coaches this spring. "In the overall coaches poll, UMass is ranked fifth, and no one has seen us race yet this season. I think we're going to be a lot faster than fifth, though."

Despite the loss of key personnel from 1997 varsity eight boat, the UMass roster is still filled with athletes whom Dietz describes as more than capable of picking up the slack. Denmark native and World Championship silver- medalist Sarah Lauritzen, Elena Maciulaityte and captain Jen Strong are expected to power the Minutewomen to their third consecutive A-10 title.

In addition to its solid core of rowers, UMass returns nationally acclaimed coxswain Laura Simon, whom Dietz characterizes as invaluable to the Minutewomen crew squad.

"Laura Simon is the second-best coxswain in the United States," he said. "She's very important to our team."

Focused on producing another stellar season, the UMass rowers open their 1998 campaign tomorrow, when they will play host to Boston College and the University of New Hampshire along the Connecticut River. Although both competing programs are considered competitive, the Minutewomen may use the Eagles and Wildcats as mere tune-ups for the following weekend, when they travel to Virginia to race national power UVA. The Cavaliers finished a disappointing fourth in the country last season, relative to their potential.

Nelson Mandela affirms friendships

WASHINGTON (AP) — President Nelson Mandela of South Africa called President Clinton a man of "thick skin and strong nerves" but stressed yesterday that he will not bend to U.S. pressure to restrict his nation's relations with countries such as Libya and Cuba.

"Libya, Cuba and Iran are my friends, and I propose to honor that friendship," the 79-year-old president said in an interview on CNN'S "Late Edition."

Mandela's support for countries the United States regards as hostile or backers of terrorism was one of the few sore spots in Clinton's visit to South Africa that concluded Saturday.

Mandela said his position on Libya, Cuba and Iran, supporters of his long struggle against apartheid, came as no surprise and did not affect the success of his talks with Clinton.

"The president is one of the most decent men I've come across, and he has got a thick skin and strong nerves," Mandela said. "We emerged from those discussions with our mutual respect enhanced. I really respect President Clinton."

On Friday, Mandela urged Clinton to "set an example to all of us" and make peace with Libya, Cuba and Iran.

Tobacco bill provisions approved by Congress

WASHINGTON (AP) — Negotiators on Sunday agreed on most of the provisions of Congress' leading tobacco bill that would change the industry about $138 billion more and impose harsher restrictions than the settlement companies and states reached in June.

Negotiators also approved for the Food and Drug Administration broad authority to regulate nicotine products, a victory for the health community and the White House. But the bill also would set strict guidelines for the agency if it ever tries to ban nicotine. For all the progress, negotiators left unfinished the central issues of debate — how much, if any, legal protection to give the industry, and specifically how to spend the $506 billion over 25 years the companies would pay.

Several negotiators in the round-the-clock talks - involving about two-dozen major players including representatives of federal agencies, private health care groups and the White House - said the sponsor, Senate Commerce Committee Chairman John McCain, likely would announce the plan for legal protections at midweek and leave the funding question unanswered, to be debated on the Senate floor. In a statement, McCain said the draft summary his staff released on Sunday should serve as a "solid foundation for the debate that lies ahead."

Police report JQA peeper

University of Massachusetts police are investigating reports of a peeping tom in Southwest Residential Area Thursday night.

At approximately 7:30 p.m., police received a call from a resident of John Quincy Adams Residence Hall who reported a "male with a camera taking pictures of individuals taking showers," UMass police Chief John Luippold said.

The alleged female who was targeted by the peeping tom told police officers she was taking a shower when she was alerted by a camera flash, Luippold said.

While police officers were searching the floors and taking statements from JQA residents, a second peeping tom report was received from an individual in Kennedy Residence Hall at 8 p.m.

"The police officers searched the two buildings but didn't find him. He was seen on several floors in both buildings," Luippold said.

Based on descriptions given to the police by the two alleged victims and other witnesses, public safety officials are searching for a "light skinned male, 5-foot-6 to 5-foot- 10, dark hair and a possible moustache."

In addition the suspect was seen wearing a navy blue wind breaker or sweatshirt, and jeans, Luippold said.

Anyone who may have seen the perpetrator leaving or entering either residence hall or may have information regarding either incident should call public safety immediately at 545-2121.

Housing Assignment office tests new registration system

By Victoria Groves
Collegian Staff

Lesley Usher, a University of Massachusetts undergraduate, was honored by the Housing Assignments office for being the first student to take advantage of the new housing preference 1-800 number to register for an on- campus dorm room.

The pilot program, entitled PAWS (Pre-Assignment Work Sheet) was tested last semester and allowed incoming students to request a living area over the phone and know what building they would be living in by the end of the phone call.

Normally, students have to wait weeks for their requests to be processed.

"More than five years ago, we started looking at how we could make it easier for our students. This plan would allow students to bond with the university much faster. The process now is very cumbersome," Jerry Quarles, Assistant Director of Housing said.

Currently, students apply for housing before they leave school in the spring, or for incoming freshman, at summer orientation. They are notified of their assignments about a month before classes begin.

The first of its kind in the nation, PAWS is expected to be used every year by 15,000 students, of which Usher was the first. She received various UMass memorabilia at the ceremony, held in Thoreau residential buildings main lounge.

Giro, Richie Perez highlight annual PR Cultural Night

By Juan Carlos Kaplan
Collegian Staff

An estimated 350 people packed the Student Union Ballroom Saturday night as University of Massachusetts Registered Student Organization (RSO) Boricuas Unidos hosted its annual Puerto Rican Cultural Night. Highlights of the event, entitled "Abriendo Puertas" (Opening Doors), included a speech by Richie Perez, Director of the National Congress of Puerto Rican Rights and the performance of salsa singer Giro.

"Our purpose is to educate the minds of all ages. We're concerned about the future of our children and we want to aid parents in making them [the children] aware of the different opportunities that are available," UMass senior and Boricuas chairperson Melissa Hernández said.

This is the fourth Puerto Rican Cultural Night that Boricuas has hosted in the past three years. "This [the event] is not only to celebrate our culture but educate others what it is to be Puerto Rican," Hernández said.

Pérez, who was the keynote speaker also addressed education and children stressing among other issues the need to prepare the younger generations and the necessity of being active within the community, be it the Puerto Rican community or of other minorities.

"Tonight is to bring us all together — unity...the typical food and music. This is family oriented. Hey, my mom's even here," Boricuas Public Relations Officer, sophomore Perla del Mar Mondriguez said.

For many, one of the highlights of this year's installment of the annual event was the traditional Puerto Rican dinner which featured "Escaveche de Guineito" a salad made from boiled green bananas or plantain mixed with onions, oil and vinegar.

The evening's entertainment also received much praise as first dancers from Springfield's Girls' Private Dancers School of the Arts performed traditional Caribbean dances including Bomba y Plena and Salsa. They were followed by UMass DJs Concepto Latino who played a variety of different tropical rhythms including salsa, meringue and techno–meringue.

Although the event was principally attended by Latinos, other members of the UMass community came to appreciate and join in on the Puerto Rican celebration.

"I like any multicultural event. You learn different things. I think we should have more of these [multicultural events]," graduate student Sean Mehrtash said.

Nor was Mehrtash intimidated by the music. "I feel pretty comfortable. It's very fast so you have to move."

The star attraction Saturday night was salsa singer Giro who flew in from San Juan specifically to perform at UMass. Giro, 27, has been singing professionally for the last five years and already has made four albums which have sold throughout Latin America and the United States.

Singing two 45 minute sets with a 12-piece back-up band based out of eastern Mass., Giro sang both old and new work including the hits "Me Engaño" (I Tricked Myself) and "Regresa" (Come Back) off his latest album, Historias de Amor (Histories of Love).

"Thanks to the people who came to see me. I am very grateful. The reception which they gave me... the support throughout my career," Giro said.

Such is Giro's star power that three teenagers from Westfield, Erica, 18, Jessica, 17 and Mariela, 19 came just to see him.

"I love his songs, they're so good," Jessica said.

"The important thing is that people enjoy themselves," Giro said.

Echoing that sentiment after an event that lasted into the late night Hernandez said, "The hard work was worth it seeing the smiles on everyone's faces."

GEO waiting for Bulger's approval of new contract

Jason Eiseman

Members of the Graduate Employee Organization(GEO) voted to ratify their new contract last week, but University of Massachusetts President William Bulger, must approve the contract before the new changes can be implemented.

Out of approximately 2, 100 graduates, 330 voted on the new contract, with 83 percent voting to ratify the contract and 11 percent voting against ratification.

"We expected the contract to be ratified," said Mahmood Ketabchi, GEO President.

Another GEO source called the ratification a "fait accomplis," and said many members did not vote because they were certain the contract would be ratified.

Susan Pearson, Associate Chancellor and chief negotiator for the administration said it would have been unusual if the contract had not been ratified.

"I'm simply pleased that two years of negotiations are at an end," Pearson said. "I don't think it was surprising that it was ratified."

She said the contract has been mailed to Bulger, and immediately after he approves the contract many of the new terms which have been agreed upon will take effect.

"I would anticipate a couple of weeks," she said.

Pearson said the administration will soon start posting notices on campus announcing their intention to recognize GEO as a union.

If there are no challenges to this, GEO will become a recognized union, and Pearson said beginning in September they will switch from voluntary dues, to mandatory dues. All other provisions of the contract will begin immediately.

Ketabchi expects the contract to be approved within two to three weeks. Afterwards graduates will begin to get their raises, and two years of back pay. Ketabchi said the raise was one of the most important parts of the new contract.

"That was really a huge victory," Ketabchi said. "We were very adamant about it. If we have it now, it's going to be in the next contract."

Pearson agreed with GEO on the importance of wage increases.

"Stipend increases are a goal we share with GEO," Pearson said. "This contract represents serious improvements over previous ones." She also cited the importance of funding for child care which has been increased as a result of the new contract.

Ketabchi also mentioned the new health care committee which will be responsible for exploring the options of providing graduate employees with optical and dental health care coverage.

This contract represents the end of two years of negotiations between GEO and the administration. In February the administration declared impasse, and cut off negotiations.

The next week the administration announced they would go to a private mediator. After several days, the mediator led GEO and the administration to a settlement on the contract. The administration and GEO will have to return to the bargaining table a year from now to negotiate another contract, as required by Massachusetts law.

WSMA hosts job fair; software main focus

By Jason Trenkle
Collegian Staff

The Western Massachusetts Software Association (WMSA) will host its third annual software Job Fair '98 tomorrow from 11 a.m. to 7 p.m. at the Springfield Sheraton Hotel Grand Ballroom in downtown Springfield.

Approximately 40 companies will be on-hand at New England's largest software job fair, seeking to recruit and hire strong, determined individuals that have an interest or experience in computer technologies and communications.

Interested students are encouraged to come to the fair with multiple copies of their resume and to dress in presentable attire. Sponsors such as MassMutual, JavaNet, Applied PC Systems, Computer Horizons Corporation, and United Personnel Services are just a few of the many software associations that will be present at the fair.

Project manager Alison Simpkins from the Corporation for Public Technology said, "in this growing technological field, which is experiencing a growing demand for employees, companies are looking for students with a wide liberal arts background, as well as majors in computer science, marketing, and communications."

In the past, students who have attended the fair have been offered positions or even job interviews from highly respected communication corporations.

Positions such as software managers, engineers, network specialists, and systems analysts are some of the many available opportunities for students hoping to get a start on their professional career.

"Software Associations in Western Mass. are clamming for employees," Simpkins said. "Companies realize that if they can get a hold of young interns and employees, not only will students have a better chance of getting experience early, which strengthens resumes, but students will also have a better chance of remaining in the company," she said.

Over the past years, there has been a misconception that most of the computer software opportunities are only available in Boston, but this growing belief is only half accurate.

According to Simpkins, "many high-tech software industries are situated in Western Massachusetts and are offering practical job experience for students that want to remain in western Mass. and for those people that want to gain good technological communication skills, as well as an understanding of computer programs."

In a technological field that is wide open, industries are further seeking for women to get involved. Past statistics have shown a male-dominated field, but corporations are now looking for women to get ahead in the computer software field.

The Software Industry is the future of computer technological business and already, it is advancing rapidly. More and more desired and eligible applicants are needed to get involved. According to Job Fair '98 chairman Ed Mangiaratti, "This year we've got an even greater variety of companies exhibiting than ever before, plus free workshops on resume writing and interviewing skills. We expect this to be the most successful job fair yet."

Israelis won't pull back troops without Palestinian pledge

By Ibrahim Barzak
Associated Press

GAZA CITY, Gaza Strip — Israel came away from talks with a U.S. mediator yesterday saying no new troop pullbacks from the West Bank can proceed without security pledges from the Palestinians. Graphically underscoring Israel's security fears, a powerful car explosion killed at least one person Sunday night in the West Bank town of Ramallah. Israeli reports said authorities were investigating whether the explosives were meant to be used in a terrorist attack.

Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu held two hours of talks last night with U.S. envoy Dennis Ross.

Netanyahu's top aide, David Bar-Illan, said afterward that Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat had so far not backed the idea of reciprocal security steps in exchange for Israeli troop pullbacks. "The main problem today was that Arafat has not yet replied to our questions and those of the Americans on how much he would be willing to do to comply with the security requirements set out by the United States," Bar-Illan told The Associated Press.

"There will be no redeployment unless we see some action on compliance," he said.

Ross and Netanyahu, whose meeting last night was to have been their last, agreed to meet again Monday, Bar-Illan said. After talking with Netanyahu, Ross went straight to Gaza and was holding late-night talks with Arafat.

Ross, who arrived in the region Thursday, has been shuttling between the two sides in an effort to break the yearlong impasse in the peace talks.

Earlier Sunday, Arafat welcomed what he said was an American proposal for an international summit in Washington, a meeting that could give him the political justification to continue the peace process even if Ross fails to win concessions from Israel. Ross has been trying to win acceptance of a U.S. proposal for an Israeli troop pullback from about 13 percent more of the West Bank over 12 weeks. The withdrawal would be carried out in tandem with Palestinian moves to do more to fight terrorism.

Israel has said it cannot withdraw from more than 9 percent of the West Bank, and the Palestinians have demanded far more, but reports have circulated that a 10 percent to 12 percent pullback was being discussed.

Asked about reports that he would accept a 10 percent withdrawal, Arafat said, "This is still under discussion." A senior Israeli official said Netanyahu and Ross did not discuss specific percentages last night but would do so on Monday, Israel radio said.

Arafat's comment that he would welcome a Washington summit came after he was asked if he was ready to meet with Netanyahu. The two have met only once in the past year, in a meeting arranged by Ross in October.

"I am ready to have any meeting which will lead to results, and I welcome the idea suggested by the American initiative to hold a summit meeting in Washington, attended by a number of world leaders," Arafat said.

Bar-Illan said he did not know of such a proposal, but noted that Netanyahu previously suggested a Camp David-style meeting with Arafat.

"Obviously we would welcome that," he said.

Arafat's aides declined to give further details.

Meanwhile, Secretary of State Madeleine Albright told a coalition of American Jewish leaders that Israel must realize the United States is frustrated with the stalled peace process but reaffirmed the Clinton administration is "very determined" to break the stalemate.

Malcolm Hoenlein, executive vice-chairman of the Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations, disputed reports in Israel yesterday that Albright used the conference call to urge members to pressure Netanyahu.

Hoenlein said Albright noted that ending U.S. sponsorship of the peace efforts remains a possible option in light of the stalemate but added that the Americans instead are pushing ideas for bridging the gap between Israel and the Palestinians.

Hospital mercy killings hard to prove, expert says

By Michael Fleeman
Associated Press

LOS ANGELES — Science may not be much help proving the case against a hospital worker who admitted suffocating or fatally drugging up to 50 terminally ill patients, an expert said yesterday. Those methods of killing can leave few signs to show up in an autopsy if the bodies are exhumed.

"It's going to be very difficult," said Dr. Cyril Wecht, a nationally known forensics pathologist who serves as a county medical examiner in Pittsburgh.

He suggested that authorities should take their time and be "very selective" about which body to dig up.

"If you're going to nail this guy, and make sure he's not a kook or a nut or something, one case against him is as good as 50," said Wecht, who has been involved in cases like the JonBenet Ramsey slaying and became famous for disputing the single-bullet theory in the assassination of President Kennedy.

Efren Saldivar, a respiratory therapist, told police in suburban Glendale on March 11 that he committed the mercy killings of 40 to 50 patients at Glendale Adventist Medical Center in the last decade. But police found no independent evidence to back up his claim and released him.

He was fired two days after his confession, his state license was temporarily suspended and he faced an administrative hearing Tuesday on a permanent suspension.

But no criminal charges were pending against him.

By state and federal law, a confession alone isn't sufficient to bring a case.

Concerned family members of patients continued to flood police and the hospital with phone calls as criminal investigators tried to find corroborating evidence that would allow them to arrest and charge Saldivar.

A six-member task force has been combing through hospital records and interviewing staff and patient's relatives in a methodical investigation that police say could take months to complete.

No patient bodies have been exhumed yet but "that's a definite option as the investigation continues," police spokesman Rick Young said.

Wecht said examining the bodies might not yield evidence, however.

In his confession, Saldivar told police that he killed some gravely ill patients by giving them surgical drugs that can relax muscles to the point that the victim is unable to breathe. The drugs, one called Pavulon and the other going by the initials SUCC, break down quickly in the body and may not leave a trace by the time the body is autopsied, Wecht said.

"They both are (nearly gone) in terms of minutes when they are given by injection," he said. "If the person lives for half an hour or an hour or two, it almost all is going to be metabolized." Even signs of the drugs could prove only that the patients underwent surgery - not that they were killed. The drugs are given to help keep a patient still while the surgeon operates.

Saldivar's other admitted method of killing, decreasing the oxygen supply to patients on respirators, is tantamount to the perfect murder: it can't be determined at autopsy, Wecht said. Adding to the difficulties facing investigators is the likelihood that most of the alleged victims were old and extremely ill with a variety of terminal diseases.

"Who in the hell knows when such people die," Wecht said. "They could die any day anyway."

Eventually expected to branch out to include the Internet, the pilot program involved the telephone so it would be accessible to more students.

"Eventually we will branch out to the web, but right now we wanted to use inclusive technology," Corey Edwards, Assistant Housing Office Manager said.

PAWS is expected to be in full use a year from now. worksheets will be going out to students at home and they will be able to register for housing for the coming semester.

"Eventually all new students will be able to get their assignments over the phone... I believe we will integrate well with NSP (New Students Program) and this will enhance students overall experience here at the university," Edwards said.

Army grounds UH–1 copters

BOSTON (AP) — After failing to find the cause of potentially catastrophic mechanical problems, the U.S. Army and the National Guard have grounded their fleet of UH-1 Huey helicopters.

As recently as last week, the Army declared the Vietnam-era helicopters were safe to fly, despite predictions that gearbox failures were likely to occur more than once a month in the aircraft.

On Friday, Army officials changed their minds.

"After careful consideration and as a prudent measure of safety, the Army is grounding its fleet of UH-1 helicopters until each helicopter engine can be tested to determine if there are excessive vibrations," said Bob Hunt, spokesman for the Army Aviation Missile Command at Redstone Arsenal in Alabama.

In all, 907 Huey helicopters are expected to be grounded for between six months and two years. More than 600 of the helicopters are used by National Guard units. The Army has 284.

Hunt said the National Guard has about 400 newer UH-60 Black Hawk helicopters in 37 states to help offset the impact of grounding the Hueys. The Black Hawk was designed to replace the Huey when its production stopped in the mid-1970s.

The Massachusetts National Guard has 23 Hueys and has not received any Black Hawks.

Major General Raymond A. Vezina, an adjunct general of the Massachusetts National Guard, said grounding the Hueys could shortchange pilots, taking away valuable flying and training time. "This will affect us terribly," Vezina told The Boston Globe. "It impacts our state and federal mission. If we have a state mission that required a helicopter, we would have to go to other states."

But pilots who have spoken to the newspaper on condition of anonymity said they were outraged the choppers had been kept in service despite safety concerns about the gearboxes.

A teacher's role

Those who can do, those who can't teach." We've all heard the saying before, typical banter about teachers we had in high school and couldn't stand. Unable to get a job doing something exciting and worldly, these men and women decided to re-enter the classroom for little pay and little respect in an effort to educate the coming generations.

With last week's shooting in Jonesboro, Ark., we witnessed from afar the deaths of four little girls and a pregnant middle school teacher by an 11-year-old and a 13- year-old who attended that same school. As her students fell to the ground screaming and bleeding during the ambush, Shannon Wright threw herself in front of 12-year-old Emma Pittman, saving the life of the child, but losing her own and her unborn baby's in the process. With a 2-year-old son and a husband at home, Wright died at the school she had dreamed of teaching at, protecting those students she had dreamed of teaching. Now, all we can learn about this woman is what we can see in a grainy yearbook photo reproduced in the newspaper along side those of the accused and the dead.

> "Instinctively, these women put the lives of their students before their own in a profession where they have to jump through hoops to get supplies and computer access and have to teach with textbooks 20 years old."
> Victoria Groves

In instances like this and 1996's school shooting in Dunblane, Scotland, where ——16 children and their kindergarten teacher perished when an armed pedophile entered the gymnasium and fired shots arbitrarily through the crowd, we can learn a lot about what it means to be a teacher at the end of the twentieth century. Instinctively these women put the lives of their students before their own in a profession where they have to jump through hoops to get supplies and computer access and have to teach with textbooks 20 years old. The day that a teacher signs a contract for $5 million a year like we see professional athletes do every day is the day that America realizes that few professions are more important or influential.

Last October, in Pearl, Miss., a 16-year-old boy accused of killing his mother arrived at his high school and shot nine students. Two died, including the boy's ex-girlfriend. Dec. 1, in West Paducah, Ky., a 14-year-old boy open fired on a student prayer circle at his high school, killing three and wounding five. And two weeks later, in Stamps, Ark., a sniper wounded two students outside a school; a 14-year-old boy was arrested after a manhunt. As these examples illustrate, more and more, teachers are expected to be guidance counselors, consoling students who have seen violence up close, some who have even seen their friends and classmates die.

Walking into a school yard is no longer considered safe. With an increase in violent crimes by children, like the one in Jonesboro, teachers are being constantly put at risk for little compensation, monetarily or otherwise, besides the selfless desire to help shape the future. Police officers get bullet proof vests. What did Shannon Wright get? Her death and that of her unborn child should serve as a reminder to all. In a time where most American public schools are scrounging for money to buy construction paper, teachers now have to worry about their own safety the minute they park their car outside the school. Frankly, they don't get enough money or enough respect.

Common criticism about public school education is that many of us graduate from high school not knowing basic skills. When teachers have to worry about avoiding shootings instead of teaching Shakespeare, and explaining death instead of grading papers, we can understand that any lack of education isn't wholly a teacher's fault and that those who believe so are clearly mistaken. As CNN reported high powered spray guns being used to clean the blood off of the school walkway in Jonesboro last Thursday, we can clearly see that their misplaced blame has become our burden.

Letters to the Editor

Same rights protect activists as writers

To the editor:

I found great irony in Elsa Allen's editorial (3/23). On one hand, she stipulated that she "doesn't have much time trying to save the world" or "rallying" for causes. And yet she has graced us all with a litany of criticisms for local activists; something I can only imagine she is passionate about, having taking so much time and care in composing her editorial.

While Allen doesn't have any "super important beliefs" that would require any personal efforts, "rallying" and the like, she does manage to "believe in the standards." She's against "all your basic -isms."

Bravo! While Allen "doesn't plan on becoming any activist any time soon," some issues have managed to garner her passive approval. And yet, it seems that while she must believe strongly in those beloved "basic -isms," it is not so deeply as her need to malign those that spend time raising awareness for those causes.

She refers to activists as shmucks. They have earned that honor by inconveniencing Allen as she "skips around campus," by asking for her support, signature or ear. In their defense, one might hope a journalist would take an interest in current politics or issues.

I would direct her attention to the fact that the very same group of rights that allow her to print her editorial also encourage the said shmucks to lobby for what they believe is right.

Allen goes on to call for "limits." She feels free speech and consciousness raising has gotten "a tad out of control." She differentiates between what she qualifies as "real issues" and those she deems "questionable causes."

Allen is missing the forest for the trees. In every aspect of our culture there is an element which is less significant in itself than the whole. However, most people would be reluctant to pass judgement on almost an entire group, discipline, or genre based upon that element. Sadly, in Allen's case, she has been more moved by her annoyance with "lime green flyers" and the shmucks that any personal dedication to her aforementioned "basic -isms."

Fight for your rights

Like every other university that has experienced an alcohol-related tragedy this year, the University of Massachusetts is in the hot seat right now, trying to revise its Alcoholic Beverage Policy. The mission is to incorporate state and federal law with a little something extra to prove UMass means business when it comes to prohibiting underage drinking. However, recent discoveries hint UMass' incentive for creating policy may not be solely the protection of students.

Laura Stock

That said, UMass and the Chancellor-appointed Alcoholic Beverage Task Force committee are taking this convenient opportunity to protect the University's reputation and attempt to flex a little muscle in the law enforcement arena.

According to a draft of a proposed Alcoholic Beverage Policy, UMass wants to extend its control over student drinking to include off-campus enforcement of the Code of Student Conduct.

In other words, the rules that currently apply only to students living in residence halls would now apply to all University students, no matter where they live or where they commit the violation.

Let me get this straight. I host a keg party at my off-campus house. The music gets too loud, invited guests become a little rowdy, and my neighbors call the Amherst police who charge me with disturbing the peace. Does UMass want to send an RA down to write me up for violating quiet hours?

Or, hypothetically of course, I have a few too many after a night uptown, get behind the wheel of my car and cause a fatal accident. Police arrest me, charge me with drunk driving and I go before a judge in the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, who most likely takes away my license and sentences me to serve time in jail. Does the Dean of Students Office want to sanction me too, and make me attend REAP workshops on campus?

I'm sorry, but the last time I checked, the United States Constitution guaranteed me the right to a speedy trial by an impartial jury of the state where the crime was committed — not additionally by a judicial board of the university which I attend. That selfsame document also protects me from being tried twice for the same offense, even if UMass could try me in the first place.

Without putting aside the Bill of Rights, as the University would have us do, lets look at the current parameters of the Code of Student Conduct. As it stands, Code regulations apply to student conduct which occurs on the grounds of UMass or any of the Five Colleges. In addition, the University may apply Code standards to "serious violations of the law or acts of misconduct which occur in other locations when the behavior distinctly and directly affects the University community."

Guess what? Unlike residence halls, having a keg party off campus is not illegal. In Amherst, all you need is a permit. The proposed Alcoholic Beverage Policy draft wants to, among other things, "explore the prohibition of kegs" — a clear violation of students' rights. So I ask, exactly who is the University trying to protect here?

There is another potentially scary element at work. The Town of Amherst does not feel its power is being usurped at all by the University with this proposed policy; in fact, the town and Amherst Select Board members like Hill Boss applaud it. Administrators say it will "improve town and University relations," which are indeed strained because Amherst apparently is to overrun with unruly students it needs the UMass Police Department to extend its jurisdiction off campus. Anything to pawn responsibility off on someone else.

Let me say I do applaud the University's attempt to enact responsibility among students who drink, but change does not have to come at the expense of students' Constitutional rights. I certainly do not advocate underage drinking, purchasing for minors or sneaking excessive amounts of alcohol into residence halls, but I am an even bigger advocate of protecting students civil liberties.

I am sick and tired of students, especially those who live in residence halls, thinking that they have fewer Constitutional rights because they are at UMass. The next time dorm security wants to check your bag as you enter a residence hall, tell them you want to see a search warrant. Police also cannot search your room without warrant or probable cause to believe you are committing a crime.

Students, be aware of your rights and do not let anyone, especially the University, encroach upon them. You can also get involved with the Alcoholic Beverage Task Force, in fact, committee members encourage it. However, to those committee members who claim not enough students get involved on task force committees, I say the administration should always be keeping students' best interests in mind when drafting policy — even if there is no student sitting on that specific board. Otherwise, we students will be left to fend for ourselves and fight for our rights... (in this case) to party.

Dear Readers,

I have received numerous calls and letters regarding my inclusion of Andrew Sala in my editorial ("Ashes to ashes") which appeared in the 3/23 edition of the Collegian. I would like to take this opportunity to respond to those who were upset by what I wrote.

It was neither my intention to defame Andrew Sala's name, nor to further inflict pain on his friends, family and colleagues who are still in mourning. However, I realize now that the mere mention of his name on soon after his passing was in poor taste. I also realize now that the mention of his name, in connection with the disparagement of the revered practice of burial, could be taken as a disparagement of Sala himself. I would like to apologize to those I may have offended.

Sincerely,
Paul W. Hayes

Did you know Clinton is in Africa?

Yes, as your sitting on that toilet seat reading this article, the president of the United States, Bill "I never touched her" Clinton, is in Africa right now.

Your probably wondering why he is there and why you should care?

President Clinton is in Africa trying build better trade relations and political ties with the African continent. And you should care because he is the first American president to visit the continent in more than 20 years. African countries are viable trade partners and should be dealt with as such.

President Clinton's tour will include visits to Ghana, Uganda, Rwanda, South Africa, Botswana and Senegal (sorry Cape Verdeans, maybe next time).

President Clinton's tour will open many economic opportunities for African countries. The huge labor force has been ignored by the rest of the world, mainly because of the many misconceptions and negative stereotypes promoted by the United States and many countries in Europe about Africa. When investors hear that the President of the United States of America is in Africa building economic ties with African countries, they will open their eyes, minds and walleta to the vast investing opportunities available in Africa.

Edgar A. Barros

President Clinton has made several eye opening statements during his trip, "I don't believe any living American today would defend slavery or the awful legacy which it left in its wake." Statements such as these can prove to be powerful. Clinton also spoke of "America's dirty hands in the slave trade," (Whether Clinton truly means what he says is uncertain, and is another article in itself).

How can these statements prove to be powerful? Hopefully when Americans here in the United States here these comments, they will open their minds to the reality that has shaped this country– slavery. Once Americans come out of denial and actually realize that slavery has shaped our world, a real solution can be implemented.

The economic profits available for investors outside of Africa and the profits available for the African counties themselves are extremely beneficial. Investors have an opportunity to tap into many 'virgin' markets while having access to a large work force. The African countries will also benefit tremendously from these investments. Unemployment rates will decline, which means the amount of buyers in the market will rise, which translates into bigger economies, which translates into more tax revenue for governments to work and build with, which means more schools, better infrastructure, more medical facilities and more funds available for research. We must step back and recognize the main reason why today, the United States has such a large economy–foreign investments.

Once one investor profits the off opportunities in Africa, all investors will want a piece of the pie. That's how the 'money world' works.

With better economic and social opportunities for Africans in America and better economic and social opportunities for Africans in Africa, the global power of our black people will reach enormous heights.

Now that you have read this article and probably realized that you've been sitting on that toilet for too long, get up and wipe you behind, then look for a friend. Tell them that the president of the western world is in Africa. Tell them that we are finally getting viable respect as a people.

Tell them that the Western world has re-discovered Africa– the real Africa.

Look at it from my perspective: Part one of a two part series

I'm walking down East Pleasant street, my eldest son by my side, my younger one tagging close behind. It's about 30 degrees outside and the wind just happens to be blowing our way. It's three o'clock in the afternoon, I just punched out and needed to pick my kids up from school. I'd let them walk by themselves, it's not too far but with the countless groups of judgementalists that peer in their direction, I prefer to walk them home myself.

I am a single parent of two children — a 9–year–old and a 7–year–old. I work as much as I can while they're in school. With my salary, after school care is out of the question. We don't even have a car — "Oh wait, there goes a neighbor, maybe they'll stop and offer us a ride...well maybe they didn't see us." Anyway, where was I? Living in Amherst without a car is not that bad because the bus system is pretty good, when it's up and running.

"Excuse me, pardon me, over here, yeh me. I'm the one who's speaking... Ma! Task what you're staring at? Oh, just admiring me? Never saw a single black father before?"

I wonder why she looked so disgusted. "Alright guys, almost home." Ms. Neighbor is on the stairs making sure her son is not getting himself in trouble again. She's a real piece of work. She attends the University, thinks she knows everything — but she really doesn't have a clue. "Hey, how ya doin'?" We go in the house and I start going through my mail...bill, bill, bill, bill...letter. The bills get tossed aside for the time being, it's a letter from my wife along with divorce papers — well it's about time. Turns out that she is getting re-married — couldn't just send me the papers and leave at that, she had to twist the knife. That's alright though, I'm dealing with it.

"You guys going over A.J.'s? Come home by dinner time."

My minister is coming by today, he's a good man, he advocates in my behalf. Being a poor, black, single father in a rural, well do to town such as this one where the majority of the people are caught up in the successes and attributes, does little for my credibility. It has become vital for me to establish a strong social network in order to survive the red tape that's attached to the stigma of insanity that has been laid upon my back. I mean, I'm poor, I'm black, and I speak the truth. No politics in my game, so I must be crazy right? Well housing management seems to thinks so. I have more visitors than any other tenant in this complex. I mean I'm living in a town without through traffic and a very low crime rate, what's the problem? The problem is that I refuse to become a prisoner in my own home. I refuse to stay couped up and hush my children in order to quiet the hypocritical judgementalists. I mean that the manager herself lives in Springfield, I know the bars she hangs out in, and the assistant manager has a pregnant teenage daughter knocked up by a Latino man. Everyone knows her business because she doesn't think twice about sharing it. It's part of her "relating to the common people" project. Yet they all have comments and pass judgements on people that they don't know and don't understand.

A black radical congress: part two

The announcement of a Black Radical Congress to be held in Chicago on June 19–21 represents a rebirth of black militant activism, as we enter a new millennium. Hundreds of African–American trade unionist, community organizers, youth and students, and others are already participating in the national process of building BRC local organizing committees. Local committees have already been established in New York City, Philadelphia, Chicago, Washington, D.C., St. Louis, North Carolina, and in other cities and states. However, we should keep in mind that there is a long heritage of African–American radicalism and resistance to the forces of white racism and corporate domination.

> "If you want to struggle against class exploitation, racism, sexism, and homophobia, come to the Congress."
> Dr Manning Marable

For example, in the 1950s, most mainstream African– American leaders and organizations acquiesced to McCarthyism and the politics of the Cold War. Black radical leaders such as the great actor/artist Paul Robeson and WEB Du Bois refused to capitulate to right–wing anticommunism. The U.S. government seized their passports and attempted to deny them their right to earn a living. Their books were removed from library shelves. But their voices were never silent. And even today, Robeson and Du Bois represent shining examples of courage and commitment to the cause of black freedom and human liberation for all people.

During the Civil Rights Movement, it was the black radicals who pushed the boundaries of political possibility relentlessly forward. Activist Ella Baker helped to establish the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee, known as SNCC. Baker admonished youthful activists to foster "group–centered leaders" rather than "leader–centered groups." SNCC and the Congress of Radical Equality involved thousands of radicals and reformers who were willing to go to jail in order to challenge unjust laws. The Mississippi Freedom summer of 1964 registered thousands of black folk who had been denied the right to vote for decades.

As integration declined and black power rose in ascendancy, black radicalism assumed a central place within African–American politics. After breaking with the conservatism of the Nation of Islam, Malcolm X established the Organization of Afro–American Unity in Harlem. Huey P. Newton and Bobby Seale created the Black Panthers Party in Oakland, California in October 1966. Brothers and sisters working in the auto factories around Detroit created the League of Revolutionary Black Workers in the late 1960s. Malcolm, the Panthers and the League all pointed toward a principled and fundamental critique of the elitists and oppressive nature of American society. They knew that there could be no freedom for African–Americans, as long as a system of white privilege, power and prejudice formed the foundations of this country. Through their agitation, they attempted to make our people more aware of what it would take to achieve full liberation.

In the 1980s, many black radicals were part of the political struggle to elect Harold Washington as Chicago's first black mayor in 1983. Much of the energy of Jesse Jackson's Rainbow Coalition came from black radicals inside the labor movement, women's organizations, and community groups. Black radicals actively participated in the moral and political struggle to topple the evil apartheid regime of South Africa.

In recent years, black radicalism has been expressed in the writings of African–Americans scholars such as Cornel West, Michael Eric Dyson, bell hooks, Angel Y. Davis, June Jordan, Julianne Malveaux, Clarence Lusane, Gerald Horne, Barbara Smith and many others. At the grassroots level, in thousands of communities and neighborhoods across the country, black radicalism is expressed in hundreds of protests: marches against police brutality; pickets and demonstrations against Workfare; public protests to improve the quality of our children's education; the fight for decent and affordable housing; efforts to establish universal healthcare and improved public health facilities.

The Black Radical Congress in Chicago this summer is only one step toward the long term effort of reversing the reactionary and conservative agendas of both major political parties. We need a new black leadership for the twenty–first century which is capable of listening to the masses, and fully expressing our discontent with the way things are today.

In its Call announcing the Black Radical Congress, the co– signers declared: "If you believe in the politics of Black liberation, join us in Chicago in 1998 at the Black Radical Congress. If you hate what capitalism has done to our community — widespread joblessness, drugs, violence and poverty — come to the Congress. If you are fed up with the two party system and want to develop a plan for real political change, come to the Congress. If you want to struggle against class exploitation, racism, sexism, and homophobia, come to the Congress. The Black Radical Congress is for everyone ready to fight: trade unionist, and workers, youth and students, women, welfare recipients, lesbians and gays, public housing tenants and the homeless, the elderly and people on fixed incomes, veterans, cultural workers and immigrants. You!"

"Sisters and Brothers, we stand at the edge of a new century. The moment for a new militancy and a new commitment to the liberation of all Black people, at home and abroad, has arrived. Let us build a national campaign toward the Black radical Congress, setting in motion a renewed struggle to reclaim our historic role as the real voice of democracy in this country. Spread the word: 'Without struggle, there is no progress!' Now is the time!"

Open up to corrupt legislation

Even Judas heard the truth...

It seems as if we still have not learned to decode the language of oppression and racism until such language become our downfall. Nevertheless let's canvas this situation of language and its roles as part of a mechanism used as the guillotine of the unfortunates.

However, remember when the land that is now America was occupied by the Natives, about 2.5 million strong living in independent tribes before they where deemed inferior by the prisoners of England, and so said Natives were branded "Indians".

Nevertheless the "Indian Removal Act of 1830" (keeping in mind that this was written into the legislation) this law was just another step in separating the Natives from their land, culture, themselves. The next law that was past was the General Allotment Act or Dawes Act of 1887 which basically was said to civilize the Natives by giving them individual ownership of land. The premise on which the Natives of this land based their survival was/is community and with the new act (Dawes Act), said community collapsed. The government, after dividing the Native's land, bought land on tribal grounds, making land available to white settlers which further created divisions amongst the Natives.

> Omar Gayle

Nevertheless lets go back a few to when the first Africans in 1526 became a reality to this land or rather this land (America) became a reality to them. Indentured they were. Laws passed. Not 1/5, Not even 1 3/5 of 1. Article 1. Selection 2. Maryland 1640. Massachusetts 1641, you "n*g*a's" now. Virginia "n*g*as" for life 1661...West Side! 600,000 "niggas" by Declaration of Independence. Different Dependence. Keep the rights!"

However 209 did not only disband Affirmative action in California, it 6 21 3 11–ed the provisions of the ruling made in 1954, selection 20...

Until next week, ask yourself...

What does language have to do with the passing and interpretation of laws and the reality that follows?

What does the celebration of war of blooded river and the event itself have to do with America and in fact the world?

"Crash your peace pipe", haiku, what does this mean...

Yes like dead back bones
Tress also stand foe to the wind
The wind as no foes.
What does the "Indian Removal act of 1830" have to do with the present? Is this act still in effect?

What is the difference and similarities between "act" and "Law"?

"The bird is in your hands."

9th annual BMCP music conference a success

By Shannan Magee, UMass graduate student & Gregory Casimir
Collegian Staff

And They Said It Couldn't Be Done.

The 9th Annual BMCP Conference was a sensational success, despite the internal struggles and rumors of the disorganized management of the conference. But all those who did attend the conference this year can attest to the success of the two–day conference.

"This was the best event I've attended in my three years at UMass," UMass student Evelyn Aquino said.

The BMCP Conference kicked off with a good start. The first day presented entertainment from UMass' own NYC Band, and a Poet's Pulpit that showcased talent like MHS, a group from Baltimore, Maryland. Poet, Buttnaked, gave the audience an "eargasm" as he skillfully played on phonics to enlighten the crowd on the importance of word structure.

The second day of the conference featured panels dealing with the different aspects of the music industry and the meaning of Hip–Hop culture. "Behind the Scenes Jobs/Internships" was heavily anticipated by students looking for career prospects in the music industry. Moderated by Chris Atlas of Tommy Boy Records, students listned as panelists dropped advice on the audience on how best to land an internship with a reocrd company.

The most attended panel was "Sista's in the Industry". This panel featured women of various positions and careers within the music business. Panelist included Cindy Diggs; UMMF, Aisha White; Epic, UMass alumnae Suncear Gretchen; Universal Records, Judie Andre; BMG Distribution, and Queen Vivian of the Zulu nation. Despite the disporitionate number of women in the male–dominated music industry, this panel showed that women are influential, and that their influence in the industry is growing.

The last panel of the conference was "What is Hip– Hop." BMCP saved the best for last. It panel featured some of Hip Hop's pioneers. The panel included Pee Wee Dance; one of the original break dancers, Grand Master Caz and Raheem of the Furious Five, Daddy–O of Stetasasonic, Water Bed Kevy Kev, Queen Vivian, and Will Strickland.

The panelists spoke on the impact of the evolution of Hip Hop culture. They questioned titles laced throughout Hip– Hop like, "rap and rappers." Grand Master Caz stated, "We never called ourselves rappers; we were MC's." The panel also warned the audience about the pressures of the industry. GM Caz explained how his group rejected a lucrative record deal on the basis their name would be spelled differently. Instead of spelling their name "Cold Crush Crew," the group was asked to change the C's to K's; therefore the abbreviated name would reflect the acronym, KKK. Panelist agreed that it was very important that an artist remained true to himself/herself.

"Maintain your individuality and don't allow others to dictate your art form," warned Pee Wee Dance. "People would come uptown and see us Breakin' and ask us what we were doing. Then they would leave and try to recreate and redefine our moves, that's why they called it break dancing. We called it Breakin'," he said. The panels came to a close and the conference was moved to the Student Union Ballroom for the entertainment portion of the night. The night opened with a keynote address by UMass alumnus Kevin Mitchell, now CEO of Codeine Records. He spoke about his experiences as a student here at UMass and the many problems that he faced. He spoke about how rejection of his vision by some of the student organizations consequently compelled him to pursue and accomplish his goals. Mitchell has worked with acts such as the Roots, Shaquille O'Neal, and is the producer of rap newcomers Peter Gunz and Lord Tariq. Following the keynote address, the fashion sparked the fireworks of the evening. Designers for the event included Enigma Designs of Boston , Soul Brothers Clothing, and Uche Onyemelukwe, a UMass student. Models graced the runway with provocative evening attire that stunned the audience. During the fashion show intermission, DFO Recording Artists, Jamie Lidell, melodically captured the audience as sang her single, "No Easy Way."

Also present was Mind & Merit, a Springfield based teen group. BMCP's Public Affairs Director, Jennifer Etienne, and Phi Beta Sigma's Corey Rhinehart, brought them because they felt it was important that young people witness first–hand some of the inter–workings of the music industry. But the crowd didn't have time to cool down from the steamy fashion show because the music entertainment came blazing right after. GP–Wu crept on stage on performed their hit songs, "Black on Black Crime" and "Chamba Danga."

The evening ended with a performance by Codeine Recording Artists Peter Gunz and Lord Tariq that had the crowd going back wild and screaming, "Uptown Baby!"

The conference ended with an after–party at the Malcolm X Cultural Center, with UMass' own DJ Wal–Gee, who will be appearing at the Tunnel in New York City on April 10, wreckin' shop on the 1&2's.

The weekend turned out to be a big success despite the difficult tasks of meeting deadlines, stated BMCP general manager, Khari Roulhac. "However, we learn from our mistakes and continue to work harder to improve the conference."

BMCP would like to thank everyone who contributed and helped make the conference possible.

Neglecting what belongs to YOU

Author's note: This is a story about a 7–year–old boy who lives with a single mother in a Massachusetts housing complex. For one day, I chose to watch and interview this little boy as he carried on his daily routine. Out of courtesy for the family, I chose to leave their names unmentioned. And lastly, in this story I had imagined my self as the young boy, and on how I would have felt if I were him.

> Stanley L.P. Sterlin

(Deep inhale) As he laid on his bed, surrounded by Ruxpin Ted, and wrapped by Flinstone Fred, he laid in darkness, counting his ceiling stars, wishing the sleep would extinguish the emptiness in his conscious.

Tonight was a night of no surprise, but of fool's paradise. He watched his mommy smoke, beer drink, and sell an ounce of weed, which serves no need in raising a seed. As he sat on his chair, watching his mommy laugh with friends, who had no care of his uncombed hair, or the roaches that stare at his dinner, in a soft tone, the winner asked his mommy, "Does smoking make you a looza?" The enthusing atmosphere along with ten brown eye's were focused on him and mommy who was in smiles, had saddened from her son's question. A drunk guest spoke out and said to the boy, "you little shithead, just because your daddy's dead, doesn't mean I can't spank you to bed." The mother, speechless and dazed from her son's inquiry failed to detail the truth, but in a high tone she reacted by saying, "Finish your Babyruth."

As he turned himself to his dessert, he closed his eye's and told his imaginary friend that he wouldn't cry, he would rather die than live with a lie.

When he finished his thought and finished his food, he rose up and walked with his head down by his shoulders. He floated to his room, a place he could feel whole and safe. Sensing the crowd had no interest in him, he purposely neglected his mother, and the rest of them. No kiss good night, no "Night, night" from mommy. The twelve steps to his heart were the longest steps he had ever experienced. The joy he had for his mother was now silenced with contempt: no more respect, just neglect, because she chooses to avoid his inquired subject.

The aggravation has been building for a long time, and because of tonight, he begins thoughts of ending his time, but not with the physical, but through the emotional. He's a smart boy with problems like a man, from a woman who fails to understand his needs. No more joy, just pain, she's no longer sweet as a candy cane. On his bed, in his mind, it will take more than a while, to remove his mother from exile.

Stars help Make a Wish

AGAWAM — It was a magical evening last Saturday as a handful of daytime's brightest stars came out to support the "Make-A-Wish" foundation. "Make-A-Wish" is a lovely charity that grants children diagnosed with a terminal illness their "dying" wish. They really do make a difference in the lives of thousands of kids out there who don't have the luxury of life that so many of us take for granted.

The event was held at the trendy chic Chez Josef (imagine "All My Children's Crystal Ball, part deux) in Agawam. I mean, I've been in some pretty ritzy establishments but this one takes the cake. The atmosphere was fab and the food... ah, words cannot describe. I broke down and had this little to-die-for chocolate extravaganza for desert. The food, however, wasn't the yummiest thing on the menu. That title belongs to the celebrity line-up which included such stars as Stephen Nichols (Stefan, "General Hospital"), John Ingle and John J. York (Edward and Mac from "GH"), Jay Pickett and Michael Dietz (Frank and Joe from "Port Charles"), Lisa Peluso (Lila, "Another World") and several others.

The evening started out with an autograph session that ran from 6 p.m. until 8 p.m., followed by dinner and then, a chance to mingle with the stars (photos , etc). Of course, that was easier said then done with 400-plus screaming females swarming Stephen Nichols and such (talk about punky). I did accomplish my mission though, photos with most of the stars (after being assaulted by hordes of women). I think, myself and the guys who met me there (fellow UMass-ians) were probably the only guys who were there willingly. The other guys were mostly tag-alongs and couldn't have cared less about the stars.

I, on the other hand, was a nervous wreck, at least with the first few stars. What would I say to someone like Stephen Nichols or Lisa Peluso, who was a vision of beauty, not to mention the best damn actress this side of the coast. Fortunately, things went smoothly and surprisingly enough, the words came to me (cruise-control). I have to say the stars were incredibly gracious, down-to-earth and generous with their time. It can't be easy dealing with 400 soap fanatics, especially the ones screaming, "I want your baby!" but they were real troopers. Stephen Nichols (Stefan, "GH") was a riot, very easy going and extremely witty. Stuffy Stefan must be a bit of a stretch for him (if I didn't think he deserved an Emmy then, I do now). He and John Ingle (Edward, "GH") were quite the ladies' men, garnering the most applause from the audience. Lisa Peluso and Laura Wright (Cassie, "Guiding Light") were stunning and ever so nice. I thought they'd have to wipe me off the floor when Lisa threw her arm around me for a quick photo. John J. York, Jay Pickett and Michael Dietz... all gentlemen. Michael Dietz's gorgeous smile had the ladies swooning all night long. John J. York was, as always, handsome and extremely appreciative of his fans, as were all of the stars. It was such fun, definitely better than your average Saturday night around here. To all of you who missed it, now would be a good time to kick yourselves in the rear.

Last week I heard a rumor that "GH" was cooking up a hot little location shoot (reminiscent of Sonny and Brenda in Puerto Rico, rolling around on the beach, etc.) for Nikolas and Robin and I thought to myself (as do so many "Days of Our Lives" characters), "Amen!" Could it be, could the romance be back? You see, somewhere along the line, romance became lost in the shuffle of things, replaced by an emphasis on tragedy and drama. The soaps became more about "breaking up" than "making up." Sure, the writer's will tell you that "throwing a couple some obstacles" is what makes for interesting drama but doesn't it seem more and more like those obstacles have become a wall. It's not about, "how can we get the two of these people together," it's about, "how can we rip the two of them apart."

Rumor of the Week: People are still buzzing about the rumor that Jack and Carly on "As The World Turns" made love during their stay in the cabin (not exactly the most romantic of circumstances but hey...) but that the show has decided to keep that tidbit of info from the audience... for now. Uh, oh, who's daddy dearest?

Sink or Swim:

Swim:

• To the Marian/Stuart fiasco on "AMC." Aren't these two make the most adorable couple since... Edmund and Susan ("Days").

• The aftermath of Nikki's shooting on "Young and the Restless." Looks like it might get a little more interesting too. Could Victor still have some lingering feelings for Nikki?

• Lisa Peluso (Lila, "AW"). The woman steals every scene she's in. Her performance has been nothing less than superb these last few weeks.

• Maria's return to "AMC" (even if she is just a vision). Ah... the scene when she told him to, "Hold on, baby!" The scene almost brought a tear to my eye. This is the kind of romance I was talking about folks.

Sink :

• Marlena on "Days." What a sanctimonious witch she is squealing on her best friend, Laura. She'd be wise to watch her step, Laura isn't exactly miss stability... she may drown your sorry butt next.

Joy Division boxed set examines the heart and soul of darkness

By Marty Keane
Collegian Staff

HEART AND SOUL
Joy Division
London

Of all the bands that formed in the immediate aftermath of the 1976–77 punk explosion in England, Joy Division was by far the most important. In their all-too-fleeting four years of existence, the Manchester-based group only released two proper albums — Unknown Pleasures and Closer — both of which are incontrovertible masterpieces of their era.

With the release of the 4-CD boxed set Heart and Soul, the brief but brilliant time of Ian Curtis and Joy Division has finally been properly anthologized. The victim of a seemingly endless supply of retrospectives and hastily thrown together collections since their untimely departure, Heart and Soul will replace all previous sets.

The first two discs concentrate on the two studio albums, adding on essential tracks like "Autosuggestion," "From Safety To Where...?" and "Glass," while the latter two discs pull together some insightful live performances and top- quality b-sides.

As always, it takes barely fifteen seconds of "Disorder," the opening track on Unknown Pleasures, to recognize that something magical is afoot. Peter Hook's unmistakable rolling bass line vies with an inhumanely precise rhythm and Curtis' compelling baritone.

"I've been waiting for a guide to come and take me by the hand," he says. Who are we to argue?

With apocalyptic imagery that burrowed heavily from the Bible, science fiction and fascist spectacles, Joy Division's dire, stark music paved the way for dance-pop, death metal, industrial, grunge and the brooding, introspective pop that bands like The Cure brought to the masses in the '80s.

Joy Division took the "It's O.K. to be pissed off at the world" attitude of the Sex Pistols and internalized it through the fractured lens of lead singer Curtis and his insistently monotonous vocals which conjured a considerably more haunting — not to mention real — vision of the world in which he was merely a doomed participant.

Considering Curtis' tragic suicide four days before their first American tour, it would be too easy to say that much (if not all) of their material plays like a soundtrack that slowly foretells of his demise, which is a shortsighted assessment to say the least. On the contrary, one cannot help feel utterly exhilarated in the music's shared humanism and feel Curtis' almost palpable sense of liberation as he purges his tormented soul. Anchored by an unforgettable melody, Curtis muses in the beautiful "Love Will Tear Us Apart," "Why is the bedroom so cold? You've turned away on your side" before revealing that "there's a taste in my mouth as desperation takes hold."

Sure, the concept of life as an open book may have begun before Curtis and Joy Division did, but no one succeeded in writing such hauntingly personal postcards from Armageddon. Even almost 20 years on, few can muster the emotional punch of a Curtis lyric. Who among today's rock elite could come up with a line like "Forced by the pressure — The territories marked — No longer the pleasure — Oh, I've since lost the heart" from "Candidate"? I draw a blank.

The band had a sound as visceral as the Pistols, but in a more atmospheric and chilling, dehumanizing manner. Blame their pioneering use of keyboard drones and While punk's fury was very in-your-face and easy to "get," Joy Division's sound comes up from behind and bites the listener. Nothing with them was ever easy, but it was always enthralling.

Several months after Curtis' suicide, Hook, drummer Stephen Morris and guitarist Bernard Albrecht (now Bernard Sumner) formed New Order, with Sumner taking over vocal duties. Over the course of the next decade, New Order were singularly responsible for the creation of danceable pop through the merging of disco, punk rock and guitar-based songwriting. Life moved on, more history was made, but the shadow and legacy of Ian Curtis has always been present.

Rock music has a thousand lost souls, some lionized like Hendrix, Cobain and Lennon, some forgotten, but we can nearly always picture them now, greyer of temple, expensively suited, dragged from retirement for some lame reunion special or alimony-quelching stadium spectacular, but Ian Curtis is different. He shares something with that other lost English talent Nick Drake in that it is as difficult as it is intriguing to imagine what songs they would be singing as they approached middle age. It's too bad we'll never know. A+

JOSHUA SUNGAREN - COLLEGIAN

Kentucky coach Tubby Smith and his Wildcats will square off against Rick Majerus and the Utah Runnin' Utes in tonight's men's basketball national championship game.

Utes, Wildcats meet in championship

By Jim O'Connell
Associated Press

SAN ANTONIO — For Utah, payback time has arrived against Kentucky in the national championship game. The Wildcats' plan: ending the Utes' season with a loss for the third straight year. Utah and Kentucky have played each other in the NCAA tournament the last two seasons, with the Wildcats winning both times. The stakes have grown each year and tonight they will be as big as they get in college basketball.

The championship pits a Utah team that pulled off two of the tournament's biggest upsets against a Kentucky team that used two thrilling comebacks to advance to the title game for the third straight year, this time under new coach Tubby Smith.

Two years ago, Kentucky crushed Utah 101-70 in the second round on the way to its sixth national championship. Last season, the Wildcats beat the Utes 72-59 in the regional semifinal and went on to lose in the title game to Arizona.

"The main thing I remember about those two games is that we lost. That's about all you need to know," Utah senior center Michael Doleac said of the recent postseason history with Kentucky. "Sophomore year it was more like we were just watching Kentucky play instead of being in the game. Last year it was a lot different. We could play with those guys and we did play with them until they had that spurt at the end when we fouled.

"It's always a bad memory getting knocked out of the tournament. This year we are a different team and a lot better defensively and a great rebounding team."

Utah's 65-59 upset of top-ranked North Carolina on Saturday may have been an even bigger surprise than its 25-point laugher over No. 1 seed Arizona in the West Regional final a week before. But the common thread was excellent defense, the Utes lead the nation in field goal percentage allowed at 38 percent.

"We look to go out and keep teams under 60 points, and if we can do that we have a great chance of winning the game," Utah junior guard Andre Miller said.

Even though this is Kentucky's third straight championship game — the first team to do that since Duke from 1990-92 — the Wildcats (34-4) may have changed more than the Utes (30-3).

Gone to the NBA are Antoine Walker, Ron Mercer, Tony Delk and Derek Anderson. Even with the loss of All-American Keith Van Horn, the Utah roster with Doleac, Miller and sophomore forward Hanno Mottola may have more future NBA players than Kentucky. And the Wildcats, who beat Stanford 86-85 in overtime Saturday, have a new coach in Smith, a former assistant to Rick Pitino.

"There was no doubt in my mind we could back to the Final Four because I know how hard our guys work," Kentucky junior center Nazr Mohammed said.

And the work got even harder when Smith started making changes to Pitino's style of pressure defense and 3-point shooting. The Wildcats still do those things but not at the same level, although they did use the tactics to come back from a 17-point second-half deficit against Duke.

"Kentucky was the number one defensive team in the Southeastern Conference last season and was number one again this season," Smith said. "I thought their halfcourt defense was outstanding last year and I think it outstanding this year. It helps when you have players that understand the game and play together and are willing to sacrifice."

These teams have a lot in common on the defensive end but little in common in the trophy case. Only UCLA's 11 titles are more than Kentucky's six, while Utah's only title came in 1944 in its only other trip to the championship game.

The coaches are as different as the school's tournament success. Smith is quiet and rail-thin and got his name as a child for how much he liked to sit in the bath tub. Rick Majerus is outgoing and rotund and has been known to have the media eating out of his hand.

"He has had an outstanding career in developing players and building programs and I think those have been some of the areas I feel strong in from Tulsa and Georgia," Smith said, referring to his earlier head coaching jobs. "I don't know him as well as I'd like to know him but I've always been a fan of Rick Majerus in the way he had coached. He is a much funnier guy than I am."

When Majerus was told of Smith's comments he proved he has a sense of humor.

"I don't know Tubby that well but a good friend of mine does and he says he's real funny," Majerus said. "I don't know about coaching styles and I don't know about personalities. He makes so much money if he gives me some I'll write a few lines for him."

The offense helped out the defense by holding the ball on its side of the field for a majority of the game. Seven different Minutemen chalked up at least one goal. Freshman John Madigan netted a hat trick, while senior co-captain Mike DelPercio scored two.

"When the defense makes a stop or John makes a save, it gets our offense going," Madigan said. "Hopefully next week will have the same result."

Next weekend, the Minutemen take on No. 6 Duke, which in hot off an 18-6 thrashing of Harvard. The Blue Devils are 7-1 on the year, with their only loss coming to No. 2 Maryland in the season opener. They are outscoring their opponents by an average of eight goals per game.

"We made a few mental mistakes that we cannot afford to make against Duke," Drumm said. "We don't look at [our record] as being undefeated. We come into each game with a clean slate."

Cannella sees an asterisk next to their unblemished record. A contest against Virginia, a game that got cancelled due to snow, would have removed that mark.

Temple midfielder Jennifer Edens struck the Owls' fourth score behind a seemingly inspired UMass defense.

Freshman goaltender Jen Nardi played well under constant early game pressure, and strong defensive efforts by senior tri-captain Amy Leder and sophomore midfielder Noelle Gorski kept the game close until about 12:00 left in the first half.

Unfortunately, the Owls' speed was too much for the Minutewomen to handle. Temple's senior sisters up the grass combining for nine goals and an assist over the course of the game. As UMass struggled while trying to chop the field up on its way to the opposing pipes, Temple moved down field quickly and fluently, with an almost liquid-like smoothness.

"There's no doubt that they have fantastic speed and their experienced players know how to use that to their advantage — and they have been for four years," McClellan said. "They're a very strong team."

"I think that we ran with them really well," Anderson said. "Our transition is a lot slower. Where we think a lot before we pass the ball, they catch and pass almost immediately."

UMass also had to contend with the Owls' physical aggressiveness, which seemed to be questionable at times. Nine minutes into the second half, Edens checked Massachusetts midfielder Jennifer Herker to the ground, then, tossed Herker's discarded stick at her as she slowly got to her feet.

That speed and aggressiveness contributed to eight unanswered goals between the end of the first half and the beginning of the second. Down 12–2, it would have been easy to have given up to their highly ranked opponents, but instead, the Minutewomen seemed to use that slump to jog their intensity.

Attack Laura Korutz and midfielder Denise Brey scored within a minute of Melissa Anderson's second goal, which came 11 minutes into the second half. Korutz joined Anderson with a team-leading two goals in the game. Both helped spearhead a strong overall performance late in the game that appeared on the score sheet as a three-goal barrage. Over the last 19 minutes, Massachusetts matched Temple in scoring 4–4.

"I felt this game was a lot more intense for me," Anderson said. "I knew they'd be scoring a lot of goals because they're a strong team, so I thought I might as well get in there if I had a chance."

"They're starting to hang their heads less and less," McClellan said. "We're starting to stay in the game. I think when we came back out in the second half and put some goals in the cage that's exactly what we needed."

The Minutewomen will attempt to ride that game-ending enthusiasm into their Wednesday afternoon home game against Brown.

Believe it, Utes & coach are a perfect fit

By Hal Bock
Associated Press

SAN ANTONIO — In the buttoned-down business of college basketball, pillowy Rick Majerus and his XXXL sweater have taken a mostly anonymous Utah team into the NCAA championship game tonight. Majerus, who shops in the big and tall department, looks like he'd be more comfortable propped up against the corner cushion of a living room sofa than prowling a sideline. But he's the least unlikely part of Utah's Final Four equation.

This is a team that lost the highest scorer in school history and went further than it ever did when Keith Van Horn was around. It is a team composed of smart guys — Rhodes Scholar candidate Drew Hansen surrounded by academic All-Americans.

And it is led by point guard who started his academic career as a Prop 48 student. Andre Miller makes the Utes go, and he is Majerus' creation, recruited by him when few others were interested. When Miller's SAT scores came up short, the coach massaged his psyche telling him, "If this is the worst thing that happens to you in life, you will have a wonderful life."

And Miller became a wonderful point guard.

Majerus turned center Michael Doleac, a future surgeon, into a genuine NBA prospect. He imported Hanno Mottola from Finland and Jordie McTavish from Canada. He coaches around his Mormon players' missionary obligations, and he has found a way to prosper.

So how does it do it? With a few one-liners, a tongue in his cheek, and a firm commitment to his players and his sport. There is, for example, next season's planned trip to Maui. Hawaii.

"We'll be there 10 days," Majerus said. "We're going to snorkel and we're going to body surf. If I wanted a hotel with a projector, I'd go to the Alaskan Shootout."

Ask Doleac about the one-liners.

"We don't hear the one-liners very often," the center said. "There might be one-liners but they're not quite as funny."

Majerus admits he can be tough on his players.

"Initially, when you play for me, I'm biting in my criticism," he said.

The bottom line, he said, is getting his players to improve and that's what he has seen with this team.

"This team constantly improved on a day-to-day basis," he said. "They like to play ball, and they wanted to prolong it." Playing in the undercover WAC — "SportsCenter would have trouble finding highlights to show of us," Majerus said — Utah was the final unbeaten team in the country and takes a 30-3 record into the title game.

"Nothing works unless the players are good," Majerus said. "I play that Madden football game once in a while. That always works. You know, it works a lot better with better players. Andre is a very good guard and these guys are very smart at deployment. They have committed errors of commission rather than omission." So what can Kentucky expect Monday night?

"We are able to use several different alignments," Majerus said. "I don't know right now what look we are going to start out with. If Kentucky guesses right, that doesn't make much difference because we will change every time anyway."

How comforting that must be for Wildcats coach Tubby Smith. Smith said he admired Majerus' sense of humor.

No problem, the Utah coach said.

"He makes so much money. If he gives me some money, I'll write a few lines for him," Majerus added.

The sense of humor probably came from a dozen years as an assistant at Marquette, the first six sitting next to witty Al McGuire, who explained that "Rick came out of the woodwork." After a year as an assistant with the Milwaukee Bucks of the NBA, Majerus returned to Marquette as head coach for three years. Then, after two years at Ball State, he was hired by Utah in 1989. Some people wondered if this was the right fit, a jovial coach bringing all those one-liners to Mormon country. Majerus shrugged that off.

"You are talking about it as if it is a Stepford Wives community," he said. "It's a big city with a small town environment. It's Green Bay, Wisconsin in the Rocky Mountains is what it is."

With Louie Anderson coaching the basketball team.

Lacrosse uses physical game to disarm Cadets, 10–4

Seven scorers prove UMass has depth on offensive end

By Casey Kane
Collegian Staff

Massachusetts men's lacrosse coach Greg Cannella shouldn't have many worries about the depth of his team. Especially after Saturday's contest against Army.

In unseasonably pleasant weather, the No. 8 Minutemen used seven different goal scorers to defeat the Cadets, 10–4, in front a crowd of 1,404 at Richard F. Garber Field.

"The effort was excellent," Cannella said. "We were physically and mentally prepared and we gave a good physical effort."

Massachusetts	10
Army	4

With the win, UMass moves to 6–0 on the season, the team's best start since Cannella donned the maroon and white for his senior season. But that isn't the Minutemen's strongest motivating factor.

"We don't look at it as being undefeated," defenseman Harold Drumm said. "We come into each game with a clean slate."

Jason Heinze started the scoring for the Minutemen. He took a Mike Janowicz pass directly outside the crease and snuck the ball past Army goalie Lou Kousouris low for a 1–0 lead.

Jeremy Guski celebrated his 19th birthday as he followed suit by circling high and letting loose an on-target shot to up the UMass advantage with 6:25 left in the first period.

But it was John Madigan provided the most firepower on the afternoon for the Minutemen, as he used short-range attacks to get past Kousouris. Madigan's first came on a extra-man opportunity as Cadet K.J. Dworzeyk served a 1:00 slashing penalty. Madigan found the rebound of a errant Mike DelPercio shot and fired past Kousouris to put UMass up 3–1.

"We basically wanted to possess the ball, hold it and get good looks," Madigan said of UMass' offensive philosophy. "We didn't want them to get any looks, especially because they are a transition team."

Army did manage a few looks, but more often than not the shots were off the mark. Following a goal by Army's Dan Monahan to end the first quarter, UMass grabbed the game's momentum and never looked back. The stingy play of the team's defense — including a strong 10–save performance from goaltender John Kasselakis — carried over to the offense, which reeled off a five-goal run to put the game away.

Jay Negus fired first in the run with a shot to Kousouris' left barely two minutes into the second quarter. Thirty seconds later P.G. Massey took a pass from Janowicz and beat the Army netminder to up the UMass edge to 5–2.

After Ken Driscoll got nabbed for a pushing penalty, DelPercio knocked home the first of his two on the day with a hard, shoulder–high shot from Kousouris' left with 10:23 left before halftime. Madigan conneted for his second after Mike McKeefrey fed him from behind the net four minutes before the break.

When the teams returned from the locker rooms after halftime, it was again Madigan who broke free for a score, in similar fashion to his tally just before the break. Heinze took the ball behind the cage where he passed to the waiting freshman. But the ball was high, forcing Madigan to jump in order to catch it. And as he jumped, Kousouris came out of position just enough for the UMass attackman to get past him.

Before the Minutemen could do any further damage, the Cadets bandaged their wound with a pair of tallies. But a DelPercio goal to end the third quarter and a Janowicz score in the fourth proved to be the final blows.

Jason Heinze withstood this Army attack and scored against the Cadets, as the UMass men's lacrosse team defeated Army, 10–4.

UMass defense impressingly stingy

By Brett Mauser
Collegian Staff

With six seconds remaining in the first quarter of their game with the Massachusetts men's lacrosse team, the Army Cadets's Steve Austin inserted a goal past UMass goalie John Kasselakis's left ear to cut their deficit to 3–2. With the quarter winding down, the Cadets had withstood a furious Minuteman attack on senior goalie Lou Kousouris and had to feel good about their position in the game.

Austin's next goal came at the four minute mark in the third period, but at that point, it did not have much impact on the game because the lacrosse team had scored five unanswered goals to put the game in its back pocket.

For 26 minutes and six seconds, the frontier was silent, the birds were chirping, and most importantly, the Minutemen were running away with the game. UMass's defense had once again taken the game into its own hands.

The most overused phrase in sport is "defense wins championships." This year, the Massachusetts men's lacrosse team is hoping that the originators of that statement had the Minutemen in mind for the 1998 season.

With Saturday's 10–4 rout of Army, UMass's defense continued its dominance, holding the Cadets six goals short of their season average. The Cadets could only unleash 18 shots on Kasselakis, well below their usual output. Each Army shot was well–earned, but with each Kasselakis save came increased frustration. The Cadets were hoping that one would trickle by to reveal a ray of hope on an otherwise gloomy day, but UMass never let down its guard.

The senior defensive corps of Harold Drumm, Mike Hanna and Jamie Doherty proved too much for the loaded Army attack. The trio, along with Kasselakis, has yet to yield double digit scoring to the opposition, leading the Minutemen to their best start since 1987.

"John made some good saves today, but we don't expect anything less of him," coach Greg Cannella said. "Today we knew that we would need to ride our seniors and that's exactly what we did."

Last weekend, Kasselakis bettered Hofstra's pre–season first team All–America goaltender Mark Spruyt. A week later, he disposed of one of his closest competitors, the honorably mentioned Kousouris.

Army had four extra–man opportunities in the second half, none of which it capitalized on, as the Minuteman defense gelled when it needed to. Despite returning two 30–goal scorers from last year's squad, the Cadets were not able to get into their rhythm.

Lacrosse holds its own

By Seth Koenig
Collegian Staff

The Temple Owls arrived at Totman Field Saturday, playing the role of schoolyard bully, and even though the Massachusetts women's lacrosse team could not overcome them completely, the Minutewomen stood firm and kept their proverbial milk money.

Temple, which participated in last season's NCAA final four and was ranked second in the nation with a 5–1 record going into the game, looked to intimidate the up and coming UMass squad as it had one year ago in an early 1997 blowout.

Instead, the Minutewomen held their own in the 16–6 loss.

"We haven't been in this game in a long time," coach Francesca McClellan said. "It's been years since we've been competitive against Temple."

When midfielder Stephanie Pavlick wove in and around the center of the Owls' defense for a point–blank shot to cut the Temple lead to a mere 2–1 after only about a third of the first half had ticked away, it was obvious that the Minutewomen were not interested in rolling over to die.

In fact, after 18 minutes, the score was 4–2 and the game looked as though it was going to be a barn–burner. Midfielder Melissa Anderson scored the first of her two goals with 17:08 to go in the half, soon after

Baseball, softball find weekend success

Minutemen pummel Explorers for three W's

The potent offense, which ranked 14th in the nation last year, returned with a vengeance this past weekend in the first Atlantic 10 matchup in Philadelphia for the Massachusetts baseball team. Ganging up on La Salle, UMass battered the Explorers for 48 runs and swept in their weekend three–game series.

Massachusetts coach Mike Stone (301–186–1) became the second coach in school history to reach the 300th career win in his 11th year.

Strolling along a five–game win streak, the Minutemen (10–5, 3–0 A–10) opened up on Saturday with nine runs in the first inning en route to a 18–0 victory. Bill Cooke (3–0) tossed the first shutout for UMass. Matt Wolcott went 2–for–3 with six RBI, smashing one home run. Ten other Massachusetts players contributed with at least one hit as they totaled 15 hits.

The second half of Saturday's doubleheader proved much of the same as UMass hit three homeruns and easily came away with the win, 15–6. Doug Clark hit two round–trippers and Pete Gautreau leveled La Salle with a grand slam in the fourth inning to lead the team with 4 RBI apiece. Muchie Dagliere went 3–for–5 to extend his hitting streak to 13 games as bested his team–high batting average to .463. Ryan Cameron pitched his second complete game, striking out five.

On Sunday, the Minutemen continued their winning ways with a 15–9 thrashing as Steve Asadoorian connected for a three–run homer in the sixth inning, the first of his collegiate career. Jeff Puleri (2–1) secured the win while going five innings. Travis Veracka earned the save through three innings of work.

Henderson tosses perfect game for UM softball

The Massachusetts softball team rode the strength of Danielle Henderson's pitching power to a win in the first game of a doubleheader yesterday at Fordham, and matched the score total in the second game to put down the Rams by two counts of 9–0.

Henderson threw the first perfect game of her career in the first win of the day, striking out 17 batters in her fifth career no–hitter. She allowed only two groundouts and the same number of pop ups in the win. The game marks her ninth consecutive double digit strikeout game.

UMass (14–10, 3–0 Atlantic 10) started its scoring with an RBI single from catcher Nikki Faessler, but it was first–baseman Kim Gutridge who starred at the plate in that first game.

Gutridge went 2–for–4 and knocked in four runs, including a two RBI single to right in the top of the fourth inning. In the fifth inning, she blasted a single that eventually carried three runners home. Two advanced on Gutridge's hit, a third came home on a throwing error.

In the afternoon's second game, freshman Carrie Jeffries tossed a two–hit shutout and allowed only four hits to propel the Minutewomen.

Jeffries' classmate Kiley Scofield led UMass at the plate with her 3–for–4 performance. Scofield contributed three RBI. Galas connected for two doubles, and Liz Wagner went 2–for–4 with an RBI.

Crew excels despite warm weather, river to beat Eagles, Wildcats in first home race

By Aaron M. Saykin
Collegian Staff

Although Mother Nature nurtured most of the winter– wearied in the Pioneer Valley last weekend, she managed to spank the Massachusetts women's crew team and its coach Jim Dietz during their Saturday race against New Hampshire and Boston College along the Connecticut River.

Minutewomen spirits were high last week before their first home race in three years, but despite a convincing victory over the Wildcats and the Eagles, the unusually warm weather dealt a serious blow to UMass.

"It was a pretty good day for us as far as racing was concerned," Dietz said. "But the water level came up about eight feet because of the melting snow. Half of our markers were underwater"

As a result of the excess water flowing into the river, the current was moving much faster than usual, making it difficult for Dietz to assess the performance of his team, which had practiced along a much calmer Connecticut River the previous week.

"The water was moving very fast," Dietz said. "I wish we could have a better assessment of our times, but this is an outdoor sport, and we realize things like that can happen."

Although unpleased by the weather, Dietz was extremely proud of the effort of both his varsity and novice teams. The varsity eight boat blew away its competition with an impressive time of 5:51, while the first two novice rowed solidly en route to a pair of first–place finishes. The freshman boat also won its race by a dominating 11–second margin.

"All of our teams looked very strong," said Dietz, a three– time Olympic participant and two–time Olympic coach. "We won all our races."

In addition to the river conditions, the fan support was much to the surprise of Dietz, who was extremely happy to see approximately 250–300 fans cheering along the banks of the river during the Minutewomen's first varsity home race in nearly three seasons.

"The most amazing thing about the entire event had to have been the spectators," he said. "It was great to see that kind of support."

Although projected 5th in the country in the preseason coaches poll, UMass will travel to Charlottesville, Va. this weekend as possible underdogs to the nationally acclaimed Virginia Cavaliers. Dietz anticipates this race to be one of the most difficult tests of the Minutewomen's 1998 campaign.

Bombing investigation over in Saudi Arabia

RIYADH, Saudi Arabia (AP) — Saudi Arabia has finished its investigation into the June 1996 bombing that killed 19 American airmen — but will not announce its findings until the time is right, the kingdom's interior minister said yesterday.

U.S. officials have repeatedly complained that the Saudis have refused to share information and were dragging their feet in the investigation.

"All the facts of this crime are with us and our intelligence exerted huge efforts to discover everything about the incident and we will leave the announcement for its time," Prince Nayef bin Abdul Aziz told reporters in Mecca.

There was no indication when that time might be.

In Washington, State Department spokesman James P. Rubin disagreed with the Saudi view.

"As far we're concerned, the investigation is still wide open. We do not believe it's over. We are continuing to pursue it and believe that at the end of the day those responsible will need to pay a price," Rubin said yesterday.

Military locator system upgraded for civilian use

WASHINGTON (AP) — The Global Positioning System, which provides pinpoint location information around the world to the U.S. military, will soon provide the same accurate data to civilians thanks to an upgrade announced yesterday by Vice President Al Gore. He said the government will expand the number of signals available for civilian use from one to three. That should overcome atmospheric distortion that affects the current lone civilian signal by providing companion channels to check for accuracy. The announcement builds on another one made in 1996, when the Clinton administration said that over the course of the next decade, it would eliminate small errors intentionally inserted into GPS to guard against its misuse by non–Pentagon users.

Taken together, the changes mean that by the middle of the next decade, hand–held GPS receivers sold to civilians should soon be able to pinpoint locations within 33 feet — 10 times as close as the current range of 325 feet.

Jewish Student Union to elect new leaders tonight

By Bryan Schwartzman
Collegian Staff

Next year's Jewish Student Union (JSU) leaders will be decided tonight at the JSU Executive Board election.

The Executive Board consists of the JSU president along with the vice–presidents of various branches which comprise the Registered Student Organization (RSO). The Executive Board works closely with the Jewish Student Union Council (which anyone can attend) to create programs, activities and policies relevant to Jewish life on campus.

Eligibility and process

Students can vote at 6 p.m. tonight at the Hillel House. In order to vote, a student must have attended three previous JSU activities, including one council meeting.

The results will be known almost immediately due to the nature of the process. Candidates will make a presentation and take questions after which each race will be decided individually. Candidates had to submit a letter of intent by last Thursday, which includes the option to drop down and run for a lower position if they lose the election.

Current President Louisa Shein said nominations will be accepted but the person who nominates a candidate will have to speak on their behalf.

Candidates

Currently the race for president is the only one being contested, but the possibility of last minute nominations could change that. The presidential candidates are Rachel Kristol and Arielle Weintraub, who is currently the Vice–President of Religious and Cultural Affairs. The President oversees the entire organization, runs council meetings, and facilitates communication between the different branches.

Shira Hutt is running for Vice–President of Religious and Cultural Affairs, a branch which organizes services and observances. Hutt currently holds the administrative position of Executive Coordinator.

Melissa Zeitz is running to head the Social Action branch. Also referred to as Tikun Olam (repair the world) this branch organizes events such as food drives and shelter visits.

Rounding out the candidates: Michelle Veyvoda for Vice President of Membership, Yoav Glockman for Treasurer, and Daniel Friedman for Vice President of Administration. Currently, no one is running for the position of Secretary.

Following the elections there will be a transition period in which the offices will have changed hands but the previous office holders will observe and instruct the new Executive Board.

President reflects on term

Tonight's election will mark the end of Shein's one year term as JSU President. During that time, Shein says, there have been some changes. One of the most obvious is the name, the Hillel Council became the JSU. Shein said the name change was part of an effort to attract more students to council meetings and events.

"We wanted to make it clear that this is a [non– denominational] RSO for the Jewish students," Shein said.

Shein has been here for five years and says their is an increase in religious, cultural, and social activity. One of the changes which have pleased her most is that students have started to lead the Friday night services at the Hillel House.

"I can see how much things have changed, there is a real feeling of student ownership in the organization," she said.

Film looks at being butch

Personal interviews explore gender limits

By Chaya Radin
Collegian Correspondent

A large audience of all ages attended the third public showing of self–proclaimed indie–dyke–film–maker, Shoshana Rosenfeld's Scent uVa Butch in Mahar Auditorium Saturday evening.

This documentary was a 35–minute compilation of several interviews with "butch" women. It told of these womens' past experiences and present notions of what it means to be a butch in today's society.

Scent uVa Butch, Rosenfeld's first major production, was loosely broken down into several sections. One of these sections explored the connections butch women have to their bodies. Some described feeling deeply connected, while others felt more negative about their physical shape and structure. One such woman who said she did not like her body later came out as transgendered and is now living his life as a man, Rosenfeld explained.

Other sections described the different ways the interviewed women felt appreciated as butches, and some of the challenges faced by these women. The women varied in the ways they identified themselves as butches. Some childhood experiences were also described. Rosenfeld found these experiences impacted the ways the women live their lives today. For example, many of the butch women in the film were tomboys as children.

One of Rosenfeld's favorite sections in the film resulted from a question she asked one of the women: "What makes you feel most appreciated as a butch woman?" She decided to ask all of the subjects this question. A woman from Boston responded that she felt appreciation came from "being valued for who you really are."

After the viewing, Rosenfield discussed the creation of the film. She first talked about choosing her subjects. She used two criteria in determining who they would be: they had to self–identify as a butch and not be famous. The producer also tried to interview subjects who were "diverse as far as race, ethnicity and religion." This could clearly be seen in her documentary.

The women she interviewed showed a wide range in their personal histories as butches. Rosenfeld explained that "some of my subjects have identified as a butch for years, others are still going through the process."

Rosenfeld discussed several of the reasons for creating the film. One of Juvenile convicts can carry guns in Arkansas

By David A. Lieb
Associated Press

LITTLE ROCK, Ark. — The way Arkansas law now stands, the two boys accused of killing five people at their school will be able to own guns the day they get out of the juvenile justice system.

Under state law, adults convicted of felonies can never again possess a gun. But Arkansas youths convicted as juveniles of similar crimes can buy and possess guns the moment they are released from state supervision — at age 18. That's because such youngsters are considered juvenile delinquents, not felons. The disparity has incensed many Arkansas legislators, who already are rallying to change the state's juvenile laws after the slayings of four girls and a teacher last week at Jonesboro's Westside Middle School.

"As far as I'm concerned, when you murder five people you've forfeited your rights to guns forever," said state Sen. Gene Roebuck, a Democrat from Jonesboro. "I don't think you can ever be trusted with guns again."

Mitchell Johnson, 13, and Andrew Golden, 11, face five counts of murder as juveniles. State law prohibits youths younger than 14 from being charged as adults, and lawmakers cannot change that retroactively.

But legislators may have a better legal case for changing the state's gun–possession laws retroactively. According to the state attorney general's office, the law in effect at the time of release — not the time of a crime — would decide whether a juvenile offender could carry a gun.

"Laws that do not operate as punishments can apply even to acts that occur prior to the law," said David Raupp, an assistant Arkansas attorney general. "This isn't punishment. This is about whether you have a privilege available to you."

Under Arkansas law, anybody of any age can buy and possess a rifle. Youngsters under 18 cannot buy handguns, but can possess them. Police said the boys in the Jonesboro massacre had three rifles and seven pistols when they opened fire last week.

Some states, including Iowa and North Dakota, already have laws restricting adults who were convicted as juveniles from possessing guns. Most states do not.

"This isn't just an Arkansas problem," said Stephen Teret, director of the Johns Hopkins Center for Gun Policy and Research in Baltimore. "That's something that the county as a whole should look into."

"We are now seeing so much crime among juveniles — crimes that would be felonies if they were done by adults — that we ought to rethink this," Teret said. "Somebody who has convicted violent acts is not somebody who I would want to see in possession of a firearm."

her desires was to "celebrate butchers." "His came through in the unapologetic and honest nature of the film.

Rosenfeld explained that she designed the documentary to be an "activist [film] about doing stuff after we leave the cinema tonight." The central issue of this activism is the "fluid notion of gender" and breaking down the boundaries set by society, proclaiming that "I have felt limits being ultimately pressed."

Rosenfeld talked about a desire to express the joy of being a butch.

"There is something," Rosenfeld said, "about humor and laughter." During the interview, the participants who were interviewed would laugh or their eyes would twinkle with joy as they described their experiences.

During the production of the film, the producer faced some challenges. She had some problems obtaining the proper technical equipment.

"Getting my hands on a descent camera," Rosenfeld gave as an example, was a difficult task. Another problem was that Rosenfield found the feelings of the subjects changed over time. The result was that she had to throw out an amount of footage which no longer accurately captured the subject's notions of their gender.

The presentation was concluded by thanking all who helped in the filming, including those in the movie and those who helped with technical equipment, distribution of the film and the Stonewall Center.

Ross fails in last try for Israeli withdrawal

By Karin Laub
Associated Press

JERUSALEM — U.S. envoy Dennis Ross was left empty-handed yesterday after Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu refused a U.S. proposal that he withdraw troops from 13 percent of the West Bank.

The American mediator's fourth and final meeting with Netanyahu ended yesterday night with no deal. He was to depart Israel early today.

Earlier, Ross suggested American patience was running out and the Clinton administration would not keep up the mediation effort indefinitely. "At some point we have to bring this effort to a conclusion," he said.

David Bar-Illan, a top adviser to Netanyahu, said the prime minister "flatly rejected the idea of a 13 percent withdrawal." But Bar-Illan insisted that "progress was made" in the meetings with Ross.

"We believe there is a much greater understanding of our position on the part of the Americans," he said.

Palestinian Planning Minister Nabil Shaath said it was too early to say whether Ross' mission had failed. "Each side presented their conditions and perceptions of the minimum things they can accept," he said.

In the West Bank, where frustration is growing over Washington's inability to break the deadlock in the peace talks, Palestinians chanting "Death to America!" stoned Israeli troops.

Israeli troops fired tear gas and metal pellets to disperse hundreds of protesters in the West Bank towns of Bethlehem, El Bireh and Ramallah. Several Palestinians were injured.

Palestinian police, meanwhile, rounded up several supporters of the Islamic militant group Hamas to question them about the explosion of a car reportedly rigged with 110 pounds of TNT. The car bomb, apparently intended for use in an attack in Israel, went off prematurely Sunday in an industrial zone of the West Bank town of Ramallah, killing one Palestinian. The blast reduced the car to a ball of twisted metal and leveled the garage it was hidden in. A gun and a hand grenade were found nearby, Israel's Channel Two television said.

Ross was meeting with Netanyahu to try to get his backing for Washington's proposal that Israel withdraw from 13 percent of the West Bank in several stage over 12 weeks. The Palestinians would meet each stage with new efforts to prevent terror attacks in Israel.

Bar-Illan said Israel made no counter-proposal to the American proposal of 13 percent. Netanyahu says Israel can give up no more than 9 percent of the West Bank, and has denied Israeli media reports that he had made a compromise offer of 11 percent. The prime minister and Defense Minister Yitzhak Mordechai explained to Ross in detail why Israel cannot give up more territory, Bar-Illan said.

But Bar-Illan said the meetings focused largely on Israel's demands that the Palestinians do more to combat terrorism, and that a concrete mechanism to verify those measures be established. Ross said the stalemate in the peace talks was beginning to "diminish the hopes that people have for seeing a very different Middle East and for building and achieving peace."

Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat blamed Israel for the deadlock and asked the United States to use "its international and regional weight" to find a solution.

The peace process has languished because of "the obstinate positions and policies of the Israeli government, which contradict the spirit of peace," Arafat said in a speech in Rotterdam, Netherlands.

Palestinian officials said they were concerned the United States was ready to modify its initiative under Israeli pressure. "We feel this is a real test for American political will and the ability to withstand Israeli intransigence," said Hanan Ashrawi, Palestinian Cabinet minister for higher education. In a U.S.-backed agreement signed last year, Netanyahu had pledged to carry out three troop pullbacks by this summer. However, he later said he would go ahead with only one withdrawal before launching talks on final borders. The Palestinians have said they would not accept any changes in agreements already signed.

Netanyahu hinted yesterday he was softening his position, saying he was ready to discuss an additional withdrawal with Palestinian officials. However, Palestinians reportedly insisted that Americans be present at such talks, an idea Netanyahu rejects.

Cancer Society donates to political causes

By Jonathan D. Salant
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The American Cancer Society, best known for raising millions of dollars to fight the disease, steered $30,000 of this year's proceeds to the Democratic and Republican parties. The contributions represent a tiny fraction of the society's $378 million annual budget. But they trouble tax experts just the same because charities may not make political donations.

Cancer Society officials contend the contributions to the Democratic and Republican governors' associations are acceptable because they went to non-political accounts held by the organizations. These accounts finance the groups' annual conferences and dinners, not their political activities.

Officials said they donated the money to ensure that their arguments on smoking and other health issues are heard.

"This gets us the same access" as others seeking to get across their message, said Linda Hay Crawford, the society's national vice president for federal and state government relations. "We wanted to look like players and be players."

But the same part of federal tax law that allows the cancer society to receive deductible donations also prohibits the society from making political contributions.

"The bottom line is, campaign intervention will jeopardize a charity's exempt status," said Marcus Owens, director of the Internal Revenue Service exempt organizations division.

The National Charities Information Bureau, a New York-based organization that tracks charitable organizations, does not know of any other charity that makes contributions to political parties, spokesman Dan Langan said.

"On the face of this, it is not a good use of charitable money," Langan said. But he also said that if the contributions allow the charity to meet with the governors, "it comes closer to being a valid expenditure."

The $15,000 contributions allow cancer society representatives to attend forums and dinners, where they can chat with the nation's governors, much like tobacco executives and other special interests do.

Unlike private businesses, however, charitable organizations have strict rules governing their political activities.

The harshest penalty the IRS could levy for any violations of the rules would be to withdraw an organization's tax-exempt status. But the sanction more often applied is a letter of admonishment or fine.

The society raises its entire $378 million budget through contributions — average donation: $35 — including some high-profile fund-raising campaigns such as the springtime daffodil sale and May relay races.

Almost one-third of its budget — $113 million — goes for research, an additional $99 million goes for prevention programs and $76 million goes for detection and treatment, such as breast cancer screenings. The cancer society was in the forefront of successful efforts last year to get the National Cancer Institute to endorse regular mammograms for women over 40.

Crawford said the society spends less than $1 million a year on direct lobbying, including the $30,000 in contributions to the two governors' organizations.

Over the past year, she said, the society used 10 of its own employees to lobby. For legal and other help, it hired the lobbying firm of Hogan & Hartson, whose roster includes former House Minority Leader Robert H. Michel (R-Ill).

During policy forums, cancer society representatives have the opportunity to discuss issues such as smoking and insurance coverage for longer hospital stays for women who have mastectomies. Crawford said the cancer society made $5,000 contributions to each governors' association last year, and tripled the ante this year because the $15,000 donations gave the group greater access to governors — including the privilege of sitting at a governor's table during the annual dinners each group holds.

"Going up to the next level gave us even more leverage to be competitive with the tobacco companies," she said. "We were on their turf. It got more tickets to go to the dinners and more opportunities to get to educational forums."

Tax experts say the contributions may be legal if they went for educational programs such as forums. But problems arise because these events are sponsored by a political party, not a nonpartisan organization, and the programs may be more political than educational.

Indeed, both the Democratic and Republican groups say their primary goal is to elect governors.

"You've got questions as to whether this is being done for political activity," said former IRS official Milton Cerny, who once oversaw tax exemptions at the agency.

High court spars over HIV as federal disability

By Laurie Asseo
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — In a major test of disability rights, Supreme Court justices sparred yesterday over whether HIV-infected people should be considered disabled because of dangers involved in sex and childbearing.

The lawyer for Maine dentist Randon Bragdon argued that Bragdon did not illegally discriminate against an HIV-infected woman by refusing to treat her at his office.

The patient, Sidney Abbott, suffers no AIDS symptoms and therefore is not protected by the Americans With Disabilities Act, said attorney John McCarthy.

But Ms. Abbott's lawyer said lower courts correctly found that Bragdon violated the law, which bars discrimination against the disabled in jobs, housing and public accommodations.

The law — responsible for such aids as wheelchair ramps at countless public places — says people are disabled if they have a physical or mental impairment that "substantially limits one or more major life activities."

HIV-infected people should always be considered disabled because the contagious and fatal nature of acquired immune deficiency syndrome severely limits their ability to have sex and bear children, said Ms. Abbott's attorney, Bennett H. Klein.

Some justices disputed whether HIV infection really creates such a limit.

Justices David H. Souter and Antonin Scalia suggested an HIV-infected person faces a "moral choice" rather than an actual physical limit on his ability to have children.

"I'm not sure that's what the statute is talking about," Souter said.

However, Justice Anthony M. Kennedy said that if a person with highly infectious tuberculosis stays away from other people, "we don't just call it a moral choice."

Someone with bubonic plague would be considered disabled, added Justice Stephen G. Breyer.

Bragdon's lawyer said the disability law aims to protect people whose disabilities affect their "day-to-day independent living and economic self-sufficiency," not HIV-infected people who suffer no symptoms.

The disability-rights law says disabled people can be treated differently if they pose a "direct threat to the health or safety of others."

"Dr. Bragdon believes that when he provides a service in the face of the risk of death he should be allowed to take additional precautions" such as insisting on filling Ms. Abbott's cavity at a hospital, McCarthy said.

However, Breyer said that "after 15 years and hundreds of thousands of deaths" from AIDS there appeared to be no documented cases in which a dentist caught the virus from a patient.

"How can we say here that your client exercised reasonable medical judgment?" Breyer asked. McCarthy replied that there were seven possible cases of HIV transmission in dental procedures. Klein said that unless HIV-infected people have clear protections under the law, many will hide the fact that they carry the virus.

Clinton's disgrace

Michael Mann

With Kathleen Willey's latest account of her interactions with President Bill Clinton, the count has reached eight. Eight women that Big Bill allegedly has either had sexual relations with or made sexual advances toward. Whether or not they were before or during his presidency should not matter. If these allegations are proven to be true, what does matter is that this pattern of sexual improprieties and attempted cover-ups proves our president is a sexual predator whose disreputable moral character is constantly disgracing our country.

Let's take a look at Clinton's love flock:

Dolly Kyle Browning — A former high school classmate of Clinton's, Browning claims that she had sexual relations with Bill which began in 1970 and didn't end until after he was elected president. She claims that a friend of the president threatened to destroy her if the affair ever went public. Apparently this didn't matter to her because she has since written a book and has recently made numerous appearances on television.

Beth Gladden Cowlson — During his governorship of Arkansas, Clinton visited Cowlson's house on numerous occasions when her husband wasn't home. Clinton says that he recalls these trips and the fact that the two were alone, but that nothing of a sexual nature ever took place. At age 32, Cowlson was made a state judge in Arkansas, a job which critics say she has no right to hold.

Gennifer Flowers — Flowers started it all during Bill's first run at the presidency, claiming they had a 12-year affair while he was attorney general and later governor of Arkansas. Clinton has admitted that in 1977 one sexual encounter with Flowers took place.

Paula Jones — Paula claims that in 1991 she was invited by a state trooper for a rendezvous in the then-governor's hotel room. Jones goes on to claim that he made suggestive comments and unwanted sexual advances, and then dropped his pants and requested that she engage in a sex act with him. The trial for sexual harassment starts on May 27.

Monica Lewinsky — This former White House intern was taped in conversation by her friend Linda Tripp saying that she had a sexual relationship with Clinton over a period of months. Bill says that he may have met with her between midnight and 6:00 am at the White House, but that he "doesn't have any memory of that." He does remember exchanging gifts with her. Monica also told Tripp that Clinton's friend Vernon Jordan offered her job opportunities to keep quiet about the affair.

Sheila Lawrence — The widow of the late ambassador to Luxembourg denies ever having sex with Clinton. When asked if he ever spent the night with her when Hillary wasn't with him, Clinton said "I believe, I believe I did. I do not remember for sure. I believe I stayed there once when she was not with me." Okay, now I understand.

Elizabeth Ward — This former Miss America (1992) told her friend Judy Stokes that the then-governor coerced her into an unwanted sexual encounter in his limousine in the late '80s. Stokes testified that this incident has caused numerous problems in Ward's life.

Kathleen Willey — A former White House volunteer, Willey claims that Clinton fondled her in a small room in the Oval Office in November 1993. On "60 Minutes," she said that Bill embraced her and then attempted to kiss her. When she resisted, Clinton put her hand on his genitals. After she pulled away, Willey said that Clinton told her that he'd "wanted to do that for a long time." Clinton denies this account, but said that he might have kissed her on the forehead in a way which was meant to comfort her.

Bill Clinton is the president of the United States. He holds probably the most powerful position in the free world. He is supposed to represent us by his actions and his moral character. Bill Clinton's mere presence in the White House will continue to cast a disgraceful shadow on our country until he is either impeached, resigns or his tenure as president ends.

Michael Mann is a UMass student.

Reject sexist ads

Megan E. Deiger

STATE COLLEGE, Penn. — Exhibit A: The HUB, a veritable sea of Penn State humanity, through which streams of students parade daily. With this amount of traffic, what better place for advertisers to peddle their propaganda? Hence, the illuminated, advertisement-drenched, mini-billboards, located in the stairwells of the Hetzel Union Building.

Exhibit B: March, the month dedicated to women's history.

Exhibits C and D: Some recent ads placed on the HUB billboards. One shows a woman parading around in her undergarments, declaring her "independence" from Mr. Wrong. Another depicts a topless female, her arms crossed in front of her chest, with a colorful map projected on her body.

Verdict: We've got a long way to go.

The mixed messages sent to women in our society are frightening. Take, for instance, the above example. Here we are at a university, the place where independence, enlightenment and rationality are supposed to reign. We preach multiculturalism and praise pluralism, or claim to. During the month of March, we plan events featuring women and post pictures of Susan B. Anthony, yet we blindly pass by, blatantly degrading advertisements in one of the most heavily traveled buildings on campus.

What should we do? Get angry. Get very angry. Every person who walks by those ads should be angry. Not only do they objectify women as mere body parts, and cater to the presumption that the average consumer must be lured to buy by means of sexual tactics, but they are presented by our University, for most of the student population to see every day. I, for one, do not see this as equality.

Herein lies our problem. We don't get mad. We walk by subtle sexism, and racism, and classism and many other – isms, without so much as a flinch. As a woman went from her father's possession to her husband's because she could not hold a job, own land or vote. We say that this tradition is harmless. But Is the legacy that it represents harmless?

The good old United States of America still boasts one of the highest rape rates in the world, a pitiful notion in light of the fact that we consider ourselves a "civilized" nation. All of these examples are subtle, but destructive.

Whereas, I agree that Women's History Month should be a time of celebration, (the WNBA, the increase of women holding important political offices, Roe vs. Wade, etc.) it also should be a time to reflect upon still existing problems.

One clever protester, armed with a permanent marker, sketched the outline of ribs and cheekbones, on the scantily-clad woman in the HUB underwear ad, and added a conversation balloon reading: "I'm hungry." It's nice to see that someone else agrees with the impropriety of the image.

In addition to special events and stories of the suffrage movement, let's reject degrading images. Let's start noticing harmful stereotypes, and acknowledging the cruelty of the past.

Let's get angry, and stay angry. Let's not accept offensive pictures of women in our student union, on our televisions, in our minds.

Let's celebrate women with praise and respect.

Individualism vs. public ed.

Spencer Baum

Yet another tale has been added to the growing list of anecdotes about the miserable state of education in America.

The newest story takes place in Virginia, where a fourth-grader, named Savanna, fascinated with her newly-applied pink fingernail polish, became inattentive in the classroom. Savanna's teacher, after several unsuccessful appeals to the girl's mother, decided to clip the fingernails herself.

Three days later, the teacher was charged with criminal assault for cutting fingernails without permission.

Given this example, it's not difficult to see why the state of American education is so poor. Savanna's story is just one of many in which teachers have forfeited any reasonable amount of control in the classroom in the name of constitutional rights.

Anecdotes like these are becoming all too common. Savanna's story is merely the latest in a growing list of petty bickering between parents and teachers in America's schools.

Although the end results of these debates are silly (criminal charges over fingernails?) the underlying issues, such as the boundary between teaching and parenting, are quite real.

These seemingly trite arguments between schools and parents highlight a fundamental conflict in American culture: public education vs the ideals of a free society.

Even a brief look at the role of public education in America reveals an obvious conflict with the ideals of individualism. Compulsory, government-funded education, by its nature, is eastly subject to abuses of individual freedoms.

From the time they are 5 years old, American children are required by law to go through some form of government-approved education, usually in the form of public schools that all citizens are required to fund.

In these schools, teachers and counselors act as government-appointed parents and families have little choice but to accept what they get.

The conflict between Individualism and public education may be the single most important factor in explaining the dreadful performance of American schools.

The countries who annually beat America in education (Korea, Germany, Japan, etc.) can all put forth a level of discipline in their schools which would be impossible in America, because in the rest of the world the individual freedoms of the students are not held in as high a regard.

Can you imagine any place but America where a student's rights are so important that an elementary school teacher can't clip a student's fingernails?

If America is ever going to fix Its broken educational system, it must first realize that compulsory, government-funded education is antithetical to the ideals of individualism set forth in the Bill of Rights. Then it will have to decide which it believes to be more important, individual freedoms or public education.

The cruelest cut

Seth Koenig

Sarcasm. It's a cruel, snide, condescending method of communication that makes whoever it's directed at look and feel lower than life... when used correctly, anyway.

Sadly, too many people out there try and fail to use sarcasm the right way, and thus come across as social invalids who deserve to be berated. The only thing that makes one look worse than having sarcasm used towards them is when that person uses sarcasm stupidly in reply.

I'm not a mean person by nature, but I know how to use sarcasm correctly and intelligently. I think this information is important for children to know (with that in mind, give this column to your little brother or sister), so I will proceed to give lighthearted examples of several times and places that this wonderful aspect of language can be used to the fullest degree of its insulting potential.

Please study these practice exercises and repeat them to yourself. Use them in real-life situations when you deem them appropriate.

Practice exercise number one, In a store: The cashier says, "Will that be all?"

You reply, "No, there are some smaller items in my coat but it wouldn't make much sense for me to pay for them when I'm such a great shoplifter."

Practice exercise number two, about exotic food: Your mother says, "How do you know you won't like this fried pork snot if you've never tried It? It's a delicacy in Zimbabwe."

You reply, "Mom, have I ever set your head on fire?" "No."

"Would you like me to?"

"How do you know you wouldn't like your hair being ablaze if you've never tried it? I hear they love that sort of thing in Zimbabwe."

Practice exercise number three, with a telemarketer: He says, "Can I interest you in a —"

You interrupt, "I'm sorry, I don't have much time now. Can I get your home phone number and call you back later? What? You don't like people bothering you at home to talk about the trade of expensive services? Hmm..."

Practice exercise number four, with your parents: They say, "Go clean the living room!"

You say, "That's funny, I could've sworn Lincoln abolished slavery quite a while ago."

Practice exercise number five, with a Jehovah's witness: He or she knocks down your door and says, "Have you been saved?"

You say, "I'm sorry, I'd like to talk to you more about this saving process, but I'm entertaining Satan for dinner right now. Perhaps I can bully my way into your house at two in the morning and the three of us can have a heart to heart and discuss it."

Practice exercise number six, with a nerdy math professor: He or she erases the board a mere nanosecond after writing down the correct way to finish the hardest problem on the homework assignment.

You interject, "Excuse me, professor, I left my photographic memory in my other jeans. Can you hesitate a heartbeat before you erase the next one so us mortals in the class can keep up?"

Practice exercise number seven, with Whitmore: They send you another bill for some little service you didn't realize you were getting.

You call and tell them, "I realize that there is still money in the world that you folks haven't sucked in yet, but you won't find any of it in my wallet. I think you and AT&T have managed to lay claim to all of it."

Of course these examples are only a select few from the literally thousands of ways one could belittle others through the use of sarcasm. It's a great verbal invention, so use it wisely.

Sandy and Danny dance up a storm, '50s style, at the senior prom in the re-released version of the classic Grease

GREASE

THE NEWTON BOYS
Directed by Richard Linklater with Matthew McConaughey, Ethan Hawke, Julianna Margulies
Playing at Hampshire Six Theaters

After a twenty-year absence, Grease returns this past weekend to again inspire little sisters everywhere to choreograph living room dance performances. Grease has already grossed $340 million at box offices worldwide, and not without reason. The movie boasts several incredibly catchy songs, lots of pretty colors, and some gloriously cheesy overacting, notably Stockard Channing as Rizzo, a high-school senior who bites off her sentences like a prison guard, and John Travolta, who turns in one of the single goofiest performances ever to grace the screen and still manages to make Danny cool.

Grease presents the 1950s, and the high school years in general, as a time when romance and friends were all that mattered. Unlike the other big high-school musical, the darker and lovelier West Side Story, everything at Rydell High turns out perfect in the end, a big reason for its popularity. The resolution would seem forced if the movie was all plot, but the music and dancing are so bright and so deeply silly that any sense of cynicism is overwhelmed. It's easy to argue that the whole thing is a lie, or even that the songs and characters are thin, but sometimes the little stirrers of the world are right. Grease is fun. And Sha-Na-Na in it in it.

Grease goes for the '50s, The Newton Boys for the '20s, but it's a bad omen for the latter when the most exciting moments of the film are the opening and closing credits.

We begin with some old-time banjo music, dusty Western photography and some promising — and photogenic — star power: Matthew McConaughey, Ethan Hawke, and Scream's Skeet Ulrich in a very different role from usual. The three play brothers who join with fellow Newton boy Vincent D'Onofrio to become the most successful bank robbers in American history — and they never shot anyone, except their own brother.

Also joining this pin-up cast is Dwight Yoakam as a nitroglycerine expert and Julianna Margulies as McConaughey's love interest who's not all that interesting.

In fact, all of the characters are one-note, stock personalities, and the annoying drawl of McConaughey as the film's resident smooth-talker doesn't help anything. Faring best in the crowd is Hawke, who gets to act drunk all the time and deliver the picture's few good lines.

The Newton Boys plays like an elementary school film strip — you know, the ones where everyone in class, including the teacher, fell asleep. There's just not much to see here, even when the action heightens. Director Richard Linklater, in a huge departure from fresh work like Dazed and Confused and Before Sunrise, seems to be more concerned with the tactics (and failure of these tactics) behind the bank-robbing than the actual thing. Too bad he's not making a documentary.

The film's best sequence, and one that prevents you from permanently snoozing, involves greedy McConaughey getting too zealous and attempting to capture a myriad of cash bags as they leave the bank. You can tell everyone had fun making the picture, especially since McConaughey, Hawke, and Linklater are old Austin natives and obvious admirers of the good ol' movie Western.

This is the only movie where the audience can't wait to leave the theater, but still stay for the closing credits. That's because Linklater gives us delicious clips of the real Willis Newton, in his 80s, in home movies and on Johnny Carson. More evidence that this should have been a documentary.

Resurgence of underground hip–hop

Adam Dlugacz

What's up, it's summer–summer time, and I couldn't be happier. The winter is over and it's time for The Lost Boyz and their ilk to take over your tape player.

• Puff Daddy's putting out a new re–mix album. Funny, I thought that's what his first one was.

• DJs, the weather has me in a particularly good mood, so now's the time to drop off your tapes if you want to get them reviewed.

• The new Gang Starr and Tribe Called Quest albums come out today. It looks like we have two contenders for the albums of the summer. Supposedly Tribe Called Quest has gone back to the drawing boards for this one and it should be more in line with Low End Theory then Beat Rhymes and Life. If Q–Tip's appearances on the "Body Rock" and other underground joints are an indication, it'll be hot.

• Generation EFX is the name of the new DAS–EFX which should be out soon too.

• I heard a couple of joints off of the new Cappadona and he's spitting box cutters.

• Lyricists Lounge Vol. 1 on Rawkus Records will be out soon. Besides the pure butterfied "Body Rock" the comp will also feature tracks by KRS–One and Zach De La Rocha (yeah, I'm wondering about that one too.)

• The Big Punisher album was supposed to be out last week, so I'm assuming it'll come out soon. But don't blame Big Pun, he's not a player he just crushes a lot.

• The new Method Man is supposed to be out some time this century.

• What's poor LL Cool J going to do, sure he's got more Benji's than seen on Robin Leach's lifestyles, but Cannabis just might have killed him. Cannabis drops mathematics in the form of deadly needles, and I'm not sure if LL can spit back.

It seems that Cali's starting to get it going on for the summer time. First the Dogg Pound has split up, which is a good thing. Then they produced the hip–hop, let's keep it going. Also with Tribe and Gang Starr we're seeing some veterans kick like no one else can. For all the commercial artists that are still trying to bite off of every fad, you're looking more flat–footed than Shannon Briggs and you'll probably fall as fast.

Peace.

that Coors "Light" Field, the House that Vinny Castilla built.

5. Los Angeles Dodgers (85–77) Pitching, no hitting. Like every year, they have the potential to win it all, but they never do.

4. San Francisco Giants (80–82) You can't win with mirrors every year.

5. Arizona Diamondbacks (78–84) Should field the best expansion team ever, and still finish last. Next year, though, they'll be in it for real.

With the theme of this season so geared towards hitting, even the teams expected to make the playoffs have question marks near the bottom of their rotation. Below are four pitchers who are critical to their team's chances of playing in October. They aren't the aces, but they need to produce.

Jimmy Key, Baltimore — Once as solid as they come, Key struggled so much late last season he found himself in the pen for the playoffs. If Key can get 13–17 wins and return to his old form, the Orioles should get back to the ALCS.

Dwight Gooden, Cleveland — The Indians need innings out of Gooden, because the rest of their starters are so young. Gooden isn't what he used to be, but if he can pitch over 150 innings and at least 12 wins it might be enough in the AL Central.

Pedro Astacio, Colorado — With Darryl Kile in tow, the Rockies think they finally have the pitching to contend. But they need a good season out of Astacio, who seems to be ready to become a star.

Jack McDowell, Anaheim — If he pitches like the Blackjack of old, the Angels will be there in October. If he doesn't, they won't.

Andy Ashby, San Diego — Ashby's star was rising before a sub-par 1997. If he can put up the numbers he's capable of, Ashby and Brown will put up a 1–2 punch to rival anyone in baseball.

Rookies of the Year:

Todd Helton, Colorado — Replacing Andres Galarraga at first base won't be easy, but the Rockies have shown their confidence in the 24-year old by handing him the job early, and he responded with a good spring.

Ben Grieve, Oakland — You know you're in Oakland when a kid who spent last year in Double A is hitting third, but Greive appears to have star written all over him. He hit well in a brief stint at the end of last year.

The Chase for 62:

After last season's heroics by Mark McGwire and Ken Griffey, Jr., everyone thinks Roger Maris' home run record of 61 in a season will fall.

But it probably won't.

People don't seem to realize just how special Mark McGwire and Ken Griffey, Jr.'s 1997 seasons were, and it will take more than just a few pokes to break it. The chase will be fun, but it ain't gonna happen.

Sorry, Tom Pacitorek.

The Pick:

I always go with Atlanta, but not anymore. After losing in the NLCS to the Marlins, they didn't get any better. They'll make it to the World Series, but once again they won't have enough. The Yankees are the best team in baseball, and have the October experience.

Yankees in six. For $73 million, anything less than it all would be bad business.

Senior skiers reflect on successful season

By Aaron M. Saykin
Collegian Staff

For the 38th time in its tenure at the helm of Massachusetts varsity skiing, 79-year old Bill MacConnell must bid farewell to his senior athletes, whom he watched grow competitively, scholarly and personally.

Amongst those who have skied in their final race for UMass are men's squad captains Jim Cranston and Eric McCormack along with Joe Costello and Justin Rouleau. Departing for the women's team are soon-to-be three-time All-American Leah Mulliero, Jill Gash and Sarah Lupis.

Although the Minutemen charge was powered by junior All-American Tom Holden for the majority of the 1998 campaign, it was the contributions of McCormack that made this season a memorable one.

As captain and leader of the Minutemen, the Lenox native produced a second-half surge to culminate a stellar season. After skiing in the shadow of Holden for the past two seasons, McCormack finally leaped into the spotlight as a result of his patience and diligence.

"Things started to click for me toward the end of the season," McCormack said. "I knew it was my last year, so I decided to go for broke. I was on a plateau for a while, but things started going my way."

In addition to the satisfaction derived from excellence on the slopes, McCormack feels his experience as team captain was very rewarding for both his performance and work ethic.

"It was a great feeling [to be captain]," he said. "There was a lot of hard work involved working with some of the younger skiers, but it is an experience that I'm glad that I had. It helped me grow. [Jim [Cranston] and I were, more or less, role models for the younger guys, and that gave of us a sense of responsibility."

MacConnell, who has coached UMass skiing since the 1960s, characterizes McCormack and fellow captain Cranston as both impressive skiers and individuals.

"Eric, over his entire career at UMass has had a steady upward improvement," he said. "He and Jim gave us the best kind of leadership we've had on and off the hill in years."

The contributions of senior Justin Rouleau, who was an intricate member of the 1998 Minutemen team, will be dearly missed. Rouleau just failed to qualify for the NCAA regionals by two positions as one of the most solid slalom skiers in the Eastern College Ski Conference.

One of the most triumphant athletes on the Minutewomen squad is Leah Muliero. Although a stellar performer on the slopes, her victory was earned while she was off her skies. After blowing out her knee just four meets into the 1997 season, both Muliero and her coaches were unsure if she would be able to compete this winter. After enduring a rigorous rehab program throughout the entire fall of 1997, the former Gould Academy standout exceeded her recovery expectations as she prepared to embark upon what would eventually be her finest season for the Minutewomen.

"She had a devastating accident in the middle of last year," MacConnell said of his 1998 women's squad star. "She was able to recover for the start of this season and skied amazingly well, and carefully too."

After a handful of top five and top 10 finishes throughout the regular season, Muliero finished a team-high 16th in the slalom as she put the finishing touches on what will likely be her third All-American honors in three full seasons for UMass.

As the talented and motivated class of senior skiers depart from the Massachusetts' program, a core of solid athletes will return in 1998 — a season during which MacConnell feels that the women's team will reach new heights and the men's squad will rank among the top three in the conference.

"We're really going to miss Jim and Eric, but we have two to three men coming in that help fill the void I expect us to ski just as well as we did this season," he said of the Minutemen. "As far as the women are concerned, we have three top recruits coming in. We may see their team as strong as the men's in 1999."

Among those hopefuls whom MacConnell mentioned as possible successors to the 1998 seniors will be junior Holden. As the top UMass skier this year and a likely recipient for All-American honors for the third time, expectations will be high for Holden next winter.

"On the whole, the season went very well," he said. "We have some great skiers coming back, and a couple of good freshmen coming in. I'm really looking forward to next season."

Holden, who has reached unparalleled heights in 1998, credits teammate and captain McCormack for a significant portion of his success.

"It was great to see Eric [McCormack] ski so well at the end of the year for a couple of reasons," Holden said. "First of all, it felt good to see him ski so well to close his senior year. And second of all, he started to put pressure on me to keep going, to working harder, and to ski faster. That's what a good skier can do. Because of him, we both improved and the team improved."

In addition to Holden, freshman Jordan Kingdon and sophomore John Griffin are expected to make a major impact in 1999, after solid inaugural campaigns this winter.

"He really had a good freshman year," MacConnell said of the potential star and East Lansing, Mich. native. "He could have gone to the University of Michigan, but decided to come here instead. We're very pleased to have him here.

"John [Griffin] is also a important part of our team. He's an outstanding giant slalom skier, and was able to break into the top 15 of the league."

After a sensational freshmen season in 1998, NCAA Regional qualifier Margaret LaBombard is expected to pick up most the slack for Muliero for the Minutewomen squad. Having picked up the slack for the injured Katie Keane, LaBombard looked like at veteran at times as the second most consistent skier on the team.

"She had an incredible freshman year, and she had lots of fun doing it," MacConnell said of his budding star. "While Leah was finishing in the top 10, Margaret was usually in the top 20, but she was consistently scoring for us."

With nearly 40 years of coaching experience and 18 consecutive conference titles under his belt, MacConnell still remains enthused and eager to prepare for the 1999 campaign. While he will certainly miss the core of outstanding graduated seniors, MacConnell hopes the promise of budding stars will bloom into another year to remember.

Men's tennis beat Fordham but collapse against Colgate

By Sanford Appell
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts men's tennis team's season fell somewhat short of a full rebound as they split two weekend matches at the Bay Road Tennis Club.

The Minutemen (3–5 spring, 9–6 overall), gained a big conference victory over Fordham 6–1 on Friday, but fell to Colgate by the same score on Saturday.

"We needed the win over Fordham for conference seedings" coach Judy Dixon said. "But I was disappointed with the Colgate outcome because we could have taken that match."

Prior to the weekend, Dixon again implemented several lineup changes. She boosted Roh Manchester to No. 1 singles for the first time, while playing Todd Cheney at No. 2.

"Rob had played really well in several challenge matches, and has been so consistent all season," Dixon said. "It was not a slight to Todd, I just want to get him going strong again."

Furthermore, Dixon gave Ryan Gately his first collegiate experience by adding the newcomer at No. 6 singles in place of slumping Kevin Curley.

"When the team has lost three straight matches, even though the opposition was tough, changes need to be made," Dixon said.

Dixon's intuition was on the mark for the most part in the Fordham match. Manchester battled tough in his debut at No. 1 succumbing to Alex Bancila in a grueling three set thriller.

"I was really pleased with the way Rob hung in there," Dixon said. "He stood up to the pressures of playing well, and Todd really showed a lot of fire at No. 2 as well."

Cheney disposed of Matt Kochis with ease 6–0, 6–2. Alex Aller was impressive at No. 3 picking up a 4–6, 6–3, 6–2 win over Steffen Schier.

Parsa Samii continued to be the most reliable UMass component as he knocked off Tony Silva 6–3, 6–4.

Bo Navarro and newcomer Gately both took straight set victories to complete the Minutemen romp in singles.

UMass earned the doubles point by winning two of three matches to open the afternoon.

The following afternoon was a less successful one for UMass, as Dixon cited a lack of concentration as the main culprit.

"Unfortunately the intensity was just not great enough on our part to come up with a victory," Dixon said.

Indeed, the first five singles matches could have gone either way, but Colgate managed to steal four of those matches to cruise to the overall win.

Samii at No. 4 was the lone Minuteman to pull out a tough one, by beating Ross Newman 6–2, 4–6, 6–4.

Cheney regained the top spot against Colgate but fell 7–6, 4–6, 2–6. Manchester followed suit at No. 2 5–7, 4–6 against Brian Boyle.

"This loss hurts because I felt we should have had some of those close ones, Dixon said.

We were regaining momentum, we had plenty of practice, and for some reason, the effort just was not there, and that should never happen."

Minutemen notes: Bo Navarro (back) will miss one week of action, but will return for the Atlantic 10 tournament. UMass returns to action on Friday at Seton Hall at 2:00 p.m.

and suspended one game. With Miller, Indiana knocked off the red-hot Hornets by 37 points. Without Miller, the Pacers scored 55 points in their 19 point home loss to the Spurs. 55 points.

My guess is that Fred Hoiberg wasn't the substitution coach Larry Bird was looking for. He netted a deuce in 20 minutes of action. But hey, it's not as if the team showed up either. Miller was out, Rik Smits had sore feet (how weak), so the Pacers were hurting.

A 27% shooting performance later, Bird learned a whole lot about his squad. With the acquisition of Chris Mullin in the off–season, the Pacers added a jump shot to a very basic Pacers offensive scheme. Mullin certainly isn't as peppy as his St. John's days where he seemingly drilled every shot in the area code.

With the Twin Towers in San Antonio, only a solid perimeter game would save the day. And we know that Hoiberg, a.k.a. The Mayor (how intimating), couldn't fill Miller's shoes. This gives Cleveland, Indiana's likely first round opponent, some hope. The idea: shut down Reggie and you shut down Indiana. A duo of Weasley Person and Derek Anderson would be able to body up against Miller.

Somebody needs to step up in the Land of Hoosiers. Hey, Larry can stick the J, I hear. Give that man a uniform.

Grogan lead the team with four goals in the game, while Barbara Hickey and Hupp each netted three. Seven other players found the net in the game, among them was junior goalie Peggy Nieves who tallied her first career goal. She also made five saves in the match.

UMass capped an excellent weekend with 17-0 shutout against Dartmouth College. Nieves made two saves in the first half, and then Hickey and Mayer each played in the second half to complete the shutout effort. Grogan was again a big part of the story as she compiled three more goals, while Sarah Newell, Andrea Vazquez, and Maria Velazquez each scored two goals in the game.

Their next challenge will be April 5 when the Minutewomen take on Boston University, Boston College and Wellesley.

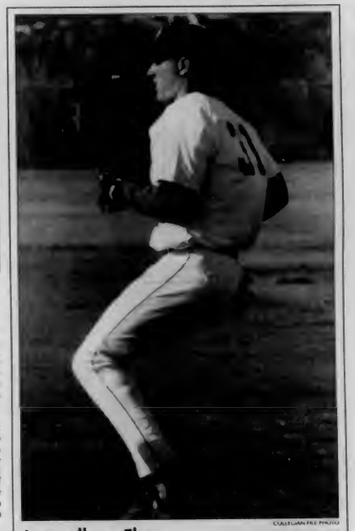
frames, his second complete game of the season, allowing just four earned runs and striking out 5 batters.

The Explorers' bats finally woke up as third baseman Fisher assisted with three RBI on a 2–for–3 day. Second baseman Kevin Ibach went 1–for–3 and knocked in two runs.

The Minutemen continued on their torrid hitting pace with 12 hits as Dagliere reached base three times for three RBI. Doug Clark, who leads the team with five home runs, smacked two more, both two-run shots. The centerfielder contributed four RBI. Gautreau ripped a grand slam in the fourth inning as he went 2–for–4.

"With hitting, it's a streaky thing," Stone said. "We can't always rely on hitting it out.



"We just try and make things happen out there, whether it be a bunt or a steal."

Today's game versus UConn should prove to be another battle of the universities as it has become a rivalry for UMass.

The Huskies are batting .325 as a team as compared to the Minutemen who are hitting .345. They are also a quick team, compiling 22 stolen bases in 26 attempts.

"They play an aggressive offense," Stone said. "They are always good and a big rivalry."

Freshman Jason Grechika will head to the mound to earn his collegiate stunt.

Believe it, Utes & coach are a perfect fit

By Hal Bock
Associated Press

SAN ANTONIO — In the button-down business of college basketball, pillowy Rick Majerus and his XXXL sweater have taken a mostly anonymous Utah team into the NCAA championship game tonight. Majerus, who shops in the big and tall department, looks like he'd be more comfortable propped up against the corner cushion of a living room sofa than prowling a sideline. But he's the least unlikely part of Utah's Final Four equation.

This is a team that lost the highest scorer in school history and went further than it ever did when Keith Van Horn was around. It is a team composed of smart guys — Rhodes Scholar candidate Drew Hansen surrounded by academic All-Americans.

And it is led by point guard who started his academic career as a Prop 48 student. Andre Miller makes the Utes go, and he is Majerus' creation, recruited by him when few others were interested. When Miller's SAT scores came up short, the coach massaged his psyche telling him, "If this is the worst thing that happens to you in life, you will have a wonderful life."

And Miller became a wonderful point guard.

Majerus turned center Michael Doleac, a future surgeon, into a genuine NBA prospect. He imported Hanno Mottola from Finland and Jordie McTavish from Canada. He coaches around his Mormon players' missionary obligations, and he has found a way to prosper.

So how does it do it? With a few one-liners, a tongue in his cheek, and a firm commitment to his players and his sport. There is, for example, next season's planned trip to Maui, Hawaii.

"We'll be there 10 days," Majerus said. "We're going to snorkel and we're going to body surf. If I wanted a hotel with a projector, I'd go to the Alaskan Shootout."

Ask Doleac about the one-liners.

"We don't hear the one-liners very often," the center said. "There might be one-liners but they're not quite as funny."

Majerus admits he can be tough on his players.

"Initially, when you play for me, I'm biting in my criticism," he said.

The bottom line, he said, is getting his players to improve and that's what he has seen with this team.

"This team constantly improved on a day-to-day basis," he said. "They like to play ball, and they wanted to prolong it." Playing in the undercover WAC — "SportsCenter would have trouble finding highlights to show of us," Majerus said — Utah was the final unbeaten team in the country and takes a 30-3 record into the title game.

"Nothing works unless the players are good," Majerus said. "I play that Madden football game once in a while. That always works. You know, it works a lot better with better players. Andre is a very good guard and these guys are very smart at deployment. They have committed errors of commission rather than omission." So what can Kentucky expect Monday night?

"We are able to use several different alignments," Majerus said. "I don't know right now what look we are going to start out with. If Kentucky guesses right, that doesn't make much difference because we will change every time anyway."

How comforting that must be for Wildcats coach Tubby Smith. Smith said he admired Majerus' sense of humor.

UMass softball batters Fordham

Henderson tosses first career perfect game with 17 Ks

By Jackie Leroux
Collegian Staff

Danielle Henderson never ceases to amaze. After yet another weekend of spectacular pitching, she has furthered her status as perhaps the best softball pitcher the University of Massachusetts women's softball team has ever seen. Last Sunday, she led UMass to a thorough spanking of Fordham when she threw her first career perfect game. The Minutewomen won both games in the doubleheader, both with a score of 9-0.

Henderson struck out 17 batters, and allowed just two pop-ups and two ground outs. The performance was her fifth career no-hitter, and her second in four starts. Her 17 strikeouts fell just one strike short of the school record she set last year against Fordham. For her efforts she was honored by the Atlantic 10 as the Pitcher of the Week.

Senior Kim Gutridge was the key for UMass at the plate. She went 2-for-4 in the game with four RBIs, including a two RBI single to right field in the fourth inning. She also had a single with the bases loaded in the fifth inning to bring in three runs, two RBIs — one on a throwing error.

Senior Tracey Osier had two RBIs, and sophomore Niki Faessler added one of her own. Freshman Annie Smith was 2-for-4 in the game, and junior Becky George was 2-for-3.

Freshman Carrie Jeffries took over the mound in the second game, throwing a two-hit shutout to take the second game. Freshman Kiley Scofield was the offensive star in the game, going 3-for-4 and adding three RBIs. Junior Mandy Galas was 2-for-5, including two doubles, while senior Liz Wagner went 2-for-4, and had one RBI.

The Minutewomen took on La Salle in a doubleheader Saturday, also sweeping both games. Henderson had 14 strikeouts in the first game as she threw a two-hit shutout. The Minutewomen's bats were hot as they beat the Explorers 3-0. Galas had three hits in the team's 15 hit performance.

UMass had two runs in the first inning, with Gutridge hitting an RBI single to bring in Galas for the first score. Gutridge scored shortly after herself, coming in off of a sacrifice fly from George. Faessler brought in Scofield in the seventh with a double to the left field.

Henderson struck out ten of La Salle's first twelve batters, allowing a pair of singles. Her total of fourteen strikeouts marks the eighth consecutive time she has reached double digits.

In the second game, six Minutewomen had two hits or more, bringing the team to a season-high ten runs, as they beat the Explorers again, 10-2. Once again the Minutewomen took control early, scoring twice in the first inning. George had a two-out single to bring in Gutridge and Osier. La Salle scored in the bottom of the first with a sacrifice fly from Natalie Straino. Galas then scored in the third off of an Explorer error.

UMass had five runs in the fifth, with Galas leading the way. She had a two-run triple that reached the fence in left field. Wagner and Osier each had an RBI. After LaSalle scored for the last time in the bottom of the sixth, UMass pushed across two more runs.

Jeffries went the distance on the mound, allowing a pair of unearned runs off of two singles. The Minutewomen will square off against the Hartford Hawks on Thursday.

Danielle Henderson was one strikeout short of the Massachusetts all-time record this weekend in her no-hitter.

Yankees, Braves top list of teams in hunt for title

If there was ever a time when anyone could hit a home run in the major leagues, it would seem to be 1998. Not only are we smack dab in the middle of baseball's "Creatine Age," circa 1997 — present, but baseball did Arizona and Tampa Bay the honor of granting them expansion teams. For only $135 million dollars, the Diamondbacks and Devil Rays get the right to deplete already thin pitching staffs and introduce more purple to the major league landscape. Ah, expansion.

Luke Meredith
Baseball Beat

Back-up shortstops, middle relievers and modern-day Tom Paciorek's should all have hope, because 1998 might just resemble one big WiffleBall game, where anyone can knock it out, and final scores look like Ivy League football totals.

But in the end, it'll be the pitching, as always. Which means that once all the fireworks of June, July and August are over, expect to see the Braves and Yankees, the teams with the best starters in each league, in the World Series in October.

One man's thoughts on how the rest of the season might go...

American League East:

1. New York Yankees (100-62) All the talent $75 million can buy, and Hideki Irabu. What more could you ask for?
2. Boston Red Sox (89-73) Not just because of Pedro either. Great lineup, good bullpen.
3. Baltimore Orioles (88-74) Thin on starters, thick on age, but if things come together they might win division.
4. Toronto Blue Jays (86-76) Not enough firepower for East, although they should improve offensively.
5. Tampa Bay Devil Rays (71-91) Not very expansion- like, but still not ready to contend.

American League Central:

1. Cleveland Indians (88-74) Another World Series unlikely without pitching.
2. Detroit Tigers (85-77) Young, solid club that can challenge Indians until late in September.
3. Chicago White Sox (79-83) Too much of a mess.
4. Minnesota Twins (68-94) Way too much of a mess.
5. Kansas City Royals (58-104) Oh boy.

American League West:

1. Anaheim Angels (93-69) If, and only if, they stay healthy, they have enough to win the West.
2. Seattle Mariners (90-72) Weak, weak starting pitching, but with Griffey, Rodriguez and Buhner you're never out of it.
3. Texas Rangers (80-82) Too many questions, not enough answers.
4. Oakland Athletics (74-88) Another disaster by the Bay.

National League East:

1. Atlanta Braves (94-68) More vulnerable than usual, which seems strange considering their pitching. They can't win 100 games every year, you know.
2. New York Mets (84-78) No Hundley, no playoffs.
3. Philadelphia Phillies (75-87) They can't be awful forever. Well, maybe they can.
4. Florida Marlins (73-89) A World Series championship, and then a youth movement? Hmm.
5. Montreal Expos (66-96) All the talent $10 million can buy. Somebody, for the good of mankind, move them out of Montreal. Please.

National League Central:

1. Houston Astros (87-75) Could finish last if pitching suffers. Moises Alou bolsters an already strong lineup.
2. Chicago Cubs (83-79) Decent lineup, bad division. Youngster Jeremi Gonzalez might be best young pitcher nobody has ever heard of.
3. St. Louis Cardinals (82-80) Besides McGwire, no juice.
4. Milwaukee Brewers (81-81) Because they always finish 4th.
5. Pittsburgh Pirates (72-90) No money, no fans. One of the surprises of baseball in 1997, and they still went four games under .500.
6. Cincinnati Reds (67-95) What can you say, really? Barry Larkin deserves better than this.

National League West:

1. San Diego Padres (90-72) Could surprise baseball if healthy. Pitching is good, lineup has few holes.
2. Colorado Rockies (88-74) Kile should get them into playoffs, but you never know about the Rockies and

UMass baseball drops La Salle as they focus on UConn today

By Kathleen Ralls
Collegian Staff

Riding a five game winning streak, the Massachusetts baseball team (10-5, 3-0 A-10) head to Connecticut to face the 6-8 Huskies. The Minutemen are returning from Philadelphia where they overpowered a 5-11 La Salle team to crack open their Atlantic 10 schedule this past weekend. They swept the three-game series by a 48 to 15 run margin.

UMass coach Mike Stone became the second coach in school history to reach the 300 win plateau during the Saturday doubleheader. His record improved to 301-186-1 in his 11 years at Massachusetts, and 355-276-3 overall.

UMass had no trouble finding their bats on Sunday as they won 15-9. Six different players tallied homeruns off starter Brian Mills who pitched six innings and allowed 11 runs. Explorer relief pitcher Toby Fisher, finished the last three innings. Junior Brian Samela racked up two hits including a three-run homer in the third. He also drove in four RBI. Rightfielder Pete Gautreau and junior Bryan Mazzaferro added to the insult with solo shots in the ninth inning.

"Our hitters really seemed to be staying on the ball," Stone said.

But La Salle would not go down as easily as it had in the previous two games. Catcher Mike Fuchs had a perfect 4-for-4 day, driving in three runs and drawing one walk. Toby Fisher went 3-for-5 while scoring 2 runs. Kevin Ibach hit 2- for-4 and scored three runs while driving in two more.

"We gave up too many hits and we really couldn't put them away," Stone said. "We need to make better pitches in crucial situations."

It was also a day for milestones for a few UMass players. Sophomore Shaun Skeffington led off the fourth inning for his first home run for UMass while sophomore Steve Asadoorian also recorded his first collegiate home run, a three-run dinger in the sixth inning. Muchle Dagliere extended his 14 game hitting streak with a perfect 4-for-4 day.

Senior Jeff Puleri captured his second victory on the mound this season. He completed five innings while allowing just three runs. Travis Veracka finished up the last three innings, earning the save while allowing two runs.

Saturday's double feature proved a judging point for the weekend as the Minutemen attacked the La Salle pitchers for a combined 33 runs and held the Explorers to just 6 runs in 18 innings.

In the first game, junior Bill Cooke was relentless on the mound, tossing a complete game for the first shut out for UMass this season. Allowing seven hits and just one walk, he improves to 3-1 on the year.

The Minutemen led off with nine runs in the first inning but were restrained until the seventh inning when they scored again. Third baseman Matt Wolcott clubbed his first home run of the season while driving in six RBI on a 2-for-3 day. Skeffington added three RBI on a double as UMass won handily, 18-0.

"We had momentum going," Stone said. "They were always playing from behind and mentally, that gives a little bit after a while."

The second half of the day proved much of the same though Massachusetts let up six runs on eight hits but still won 15-6. Junior Ryan Cameron pitched the full nine

Nets face playoff expulsion; Pacer's suffer without Miller

Brett Mauser
the NBA

All right, finally, the NBA can deal with its own type of Madness. They can get mad, can't they? Sure they can, just ask Vlade Divac, who was on the receiving end of a Reggie Miller elbow. There's plenty of madness left to go around, especially during the home stretch of a wild playoff race.

The New Jersey Nets last year witnessed one of their worst seasons ever, placing fifth in the Atlantic Division, ahead of only the hapless 76er's and Celtics. In mid- February, the All-Star Break came around and the Nets were feeling good about themselves, holding onto second place in the division.

Jayson Williams' appearance in the All-Star Game represented the high point of the season for the boys of Jersey. Finally, they had gained respect from their peers.

The real test came a few weeks later when their franchise player, Williams, sat out with back stiffness. Gone was their center, who, at any rate, was a stretch. Gone was the NBA's second leading rebounder and emotional leader on and off the court.

With Williams ailing, the Nets faced its toughest stretch of the season, taking road trips to Chicago, San Antonio, New York, and Miami, to go along with home dates vs. Utah, Charlotte, and Orlando. In Williams' time off, the Nets posted a 2-7 record, plummeting to ninth in the conference, with wins over the Magic and in Dallas.

Coach John Calipari had to devise a formula to make up for the lost height in the middle. That he did not. He tried to run and it came back to haunt them as turnovers forced New Jersey to play the comeback game. Now the Nets face an uphill battle in a bigger arena, losing three of ten in the month of March, and needing to crawl back into the eighth spot to draw the Chicago Bulls in the first round.

While talking about the Bulls, the return of Luc Longley to the lineup adds more punch to an already stacked Chicago lineup. In his first game back, Longley notched 14 points and nine rebounds against a solid defender, Milwaukee's Ervin Johnson. The Bulls picked up their 12th straight win over the Bucks, who have hired Chris Ford as coach to take the place of David Copperfield at the helm of the world's greatest disappearing act.

Without question, Chicago is scary. At 55-17, they own the best record in the NBA, but 14 of those losses are on the road. A chink in the Bulls armor? Hardly. With Scottie Pippen back, it's hard to not pick the Bulls to win their sixth championship in eight years. Sometimes I just wish NBA players would keep their word so I could be right every once in a while.

I see only Seattle and Utah as the upset waiting to happen. To beat the Bulls in the playoffs (key phrase: in the playoffs), a team must play smart basketball, fending off the temptations of Michael Jordan and Dennis Rodman. Secondly, only a great home team can upend this juggernaut. Winning in Chicago only means that a team has to go back to their own domain and win out. Seattle and Utah have nine-home losses between them, so with a nudge, the Bulls pedestal could fall.

New York is running out of time. Patrick Ewing is 35 and needs to win now before the team is taken apart. If Ewing returns from wrist surgery for the Knicks's final charge to dethrone the Bulls, he'll need help from his frontcourt mates. Ewing isn't the only one on his last legs. The six players the Knicks have topping the 6'9" mark average 36 years old. The team has been overachieving all season with the absence of their leading scorer and rebounder. Currently, they are seventh in the conference, aligned with Miami in the first round.

Ewing's return will give the Knicks the much-needed emotional boost. Allan Houston has taken over the reins of the team on offense, while Charles Oakley and Larry Johnson have guarded the paint by playing help defense. A Houston-Ewing 1-2 punch would look good, but if Ewing's fossilesque body can't return to last year's form, look for an early exit. A young, physical frontcourt has given the Knicks problems all year, and rumor has it Alonzo Mourning and P.J. Brown like to throw their bodies around. Ask Charlie Ward. He knows.

Reggie Miller, as stated before, connected on a sweet elbow to Divac, but paid the price. He was fined $7,500

No. 7 water polo wins 3

By Paul Teves
Collegian Staff

After finishing 6-3 on a tough California road trip, the Massachusetts women's water polo team returned to the east and continued their domination of the region. They preserved victories over Wesleyan, Brown and host Dartmouth College.

With the three wins, No. 7 UMass improves it record to 15-3. The weekend began with a 20-1 rout of Wesleyan. Everyone was involved in the scoring as freshman Erin Hillier led the team with three goals, and a host of others including Claudia Clement, Lyndsay Crenshaw, Katie Grogan, Marcie Hupp and Katie Mayer all contributed two goals each. The defense was outstanding, as Peggy Nieves made eight saves in goal.

UMass then played Brown University, who they also routed 17-4. Again, different people chipped in for the Minutewomen.

Saddam does things that makes U.S. mad

This is Sadaam.

Saddaam is from Iraq, a nation the United States does not like. People in the U.S. government think he is building weapons filled iwith icky germs that could kill people.

We almost tried to kill Saddaam because of his bombs.

That would have been bad if you were Saddam, but good if you live in the U.S. and like having cheap gas and oil.

What do you think this has to do with the cheap oil prices at the gas stations on Route 9?

"Whitey" Bulger seeks refuge at UM

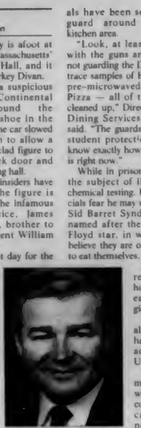
By Mike Tentacle
Special to the Collegian

Something shady is afoot at the University of Massachusetts' Berkshire Dining Hall, and it isn't last week's Turkey Divan.

Sources report a suspicious black Lincoln Continental screeching around the Southwest horseshoe in the pre-dawn hours. The car slowed down just enough to allow a mysterious, white-clad figure to jump out the back door and sprint into the dining hall.

Dining Services insiders have confirmed that the figure is none other than the infamous fugitive of justice, James "Whitey" Bulger, brother to University President William Bulger.

"Today is a great day for the University," Chancellor David K. Scott remarked, as usual. "President Bulger has done a lot to re-vamp this institution. He put money in our bank accounts and commercials on our television sets. So what if he wants us to harbor escaped criminals?



"Whitey is part of the UMass family, I suppose. Besides, he's the only one who can keep up with me when we go shot-for-shot at Anthony's."

Administrators became suspicious when the Dining Service's budget quadrupled this year with funds being traced to a numbered Swiss Bank Account and Vito's Trattoria of Boston's North End.

In addition, the number of black-suited, sunglass-wearing, revolver-packing goons in Southwest Residential Area has tripled since the fall. Specifically, said shady individuals have been seen standing guard around Berkshire's kitchen area.

"Look, at least those guys with the guns and shades are not guarding the DC to cover up trace samples of Ebola found in pre-microwaved Stonewilly's Pizza — all of that has been cleaned up," Director of UMass Dining Services Sal Monella said. "The guards are there for student protection. We don't know exactly how stable Whitey is right now."

While in prison, Whitey was the subject of illegal inmate chemical testing. University officials fear he may suffer from the Sid Barret Syndrome (SBS), named after the former Pink Floyd star, in which victims believe they are oranges and try to eat themselves.

University President William Bulger

Butterfield residents are hoping the disease is contagious.

However, not all students are happy with this addition to University staff.

"I don't get it man, what's with all the corned beef and cabbage dinners?" UMass student Vito Antonio Bonnaduce, of Long Island, N.Y., said of DC menu changes thought to be linked to Whitey's new employment. "All my boys in Coolidge have been farting up a freakin' storm. It's gotten so bad they've peeled the paint on my 1-Ros and ruined my ground-fx. I want my cavatelli supreme back!"

Since his autobiography has been pulled from bookstore shelves and there are no more UMass home basketball games, President Bulger could not make the trip to Amherst for comment.

"Tons of them. And I'm gonna nail them all. I'll be like 'Hey, I'm the Chancellor. Wanna be my intern?' Bulger always gets chicks that way, and he's not even Chancellor. It pisses me off, you know? And what's better than pancakes? I like blueberry pancakes."

Students have long wished for Time-Out to re-open, and most are excited about the impending re-opening.

"Yeah, it'll be great," senior cannabis major Danny Pinatauro said. "We used to party with David K. all the time. At Homecoming, he was doing shots until halftime, and if we didn't stop him, he said he was going to run out on the field and scream 'I'll kick Bulger's ass any day of the week.' He can party. And he loves blueberry pancakes. When he makes them, he soaks them in vodka. They must be good. He eats a box of them a day."

Scott has booked REO Speedwagon for opening night.

Dave Matthews to headline '98 Spring Concert

By Bye Marlee "Peachy" Kaen
Collegian Egotist

After putting on a really cool Spring Concert last year featuring big draws like The Jazz Mandolin Project and Trick Knee, University Productions & Concerts (UPC if you must) have reeeaaallly outdone themselves this year.

They have booked the Dave Matthews Band, all 724 (at last count) members of the Wu-Tang Clan and three portly older dudes who go by the name "The Three Tenors" — who I think suck, but hey, they're alternative.

Funded by the generous support of a cockfighting exhibition held last semester — won by "Little Chancellor" — UPC is "rolling in the dough," according to Jody Gagnon, who tells the venerable campus organization what to do and pulls their strings like puppets.

This year's Spring Concert is set to take place on Sunday, May 43 at 12 a.m. It will be held in the cavernous confines of GEO's office (you know, the one with the neon chalk all over the walls). Due to those assholes at MTV driving up prices of concert tickets, the show is gonna cost $3.50, but methinks if enough people bitch and complain — read: hold a protest with big megaphones — you can get in for free. Hell, if that doesn't work, take over the building!

As everyone knows by now, Dave Matthews Band recently sold out their June 5 show at Foxboro Stadium the day it went on sale, selling some 50,000-plus tickets. Why then is Dave Matthews Band playing here at UMass? The answer is simple, Matthews says.

"UPC came to us and offered us like $2,000,000 to play at UMass. I'm a whore for money so I couldn't say no," Matthews said.

The aspiring hippie also added their new album, due out later this month, "is just filled with a bunch of the same crap as before."

"Same shit, different album," Matthews said.

Also on the bill is the hip-hop collective Wu-Tang Clan who promise to put on a show that will "fkin' blow everyone's damn mind and throw the shit down your throats,"

Chancellor re-opens Amherst's Time-Out

By Luke Springer
Collegian Staff

AMHERST — After a year out of business, Time-Out has found a new home.

In a move designed to bring back what many consider an Amherst classic, University of Massachusetts Chancellor David K. Scott announced today that he used the GEO's budget for the fiscal year 1998 to buy Time-Out, which he will re-open under a new name, "David K.'s Pancakes, Ho's and Dreams."

"Look, I love to drink," Scott said. "I mean, I've been wasted since the day I showed up here. And what's better than pancakes? I like blueberry pancakes."

Local politicians were surprised that Scott made the move, considering Time-Out's reputation and the fact that he's the Chancellor. But Scott, who said in his 1995 Commencement speech that he's just an "Oxford-educated, pancake-eating crazy bastard ya' don't wanna mess wit," has a plan.

"I'm bringing in chicks," Scott said.

UMass police chief resigns

Luippold calls it quits after rabid racoon run-in and shower violation

By Caffeine Girl
Dunkin Donuts Staff

University of Massachusetts Police Chief John Luippold resigned late last night, following a day of what he called "pure hell."

In his resignation letter given to Chancellor David K. Scott at 11 p.m. yesterday, Luippold wrote, "after being chased by five rabid raccoons, being the victim of a peeping tom and having my vehicle vandalized and stolen in our own police station parking lot, I feel it is time to start having conversations about a new profession."

Students walking to class reported seeing a distressed, 6- foot-tall, strawberry blonde-haired, mustached, pasty-white, lanky, thin, individual in a police uniform running like a "crazy man with arms waving" from five rabid raccoons which were later captured and donated to students for pets.

"I didn't know what to do, he was running and screaming to get help," senior finance major Ima Thief said.

Following the animal chase, a sweaty Luippold decided to take a shower and while whistling "O Danny Boy" in a John Quincy Adams Residence Hall shower stall in Southwest, when he suddenly became aware he was not alone.

"She was staring at me and began to whistle along," said Luippold, who reportedly chased the individual down the hall screaming, "Hey wait I need to have a conversation with you."

Witnesses of the incident described the alleged peeping tom as a white female, medium build, wearing an Abercrombie & Fitch baseball cap, a UMass sweatshirt and Adidas warm-up pants.

As if that were not enough, Luippold discovered his vehicle was missing when he left Southwest.

"I walked around the parking lot for 20 minutes before I realized that it just wasn't there," he said.

Later Luippold's brown, unmarked Crown Victoria was located at the bottom of the Campus Pond.

"Two car alarm systems and the Club and I still can't protect my vehicle from these UMass hoodlums," Luippold said.

Upon getting the vehicle out of the water, Luippold reported that the windows were broken, key marks ran along the side of the vehicle and the stereo system had been stolen.

"I suppose that's what I get for leaving my door unlocked and leaving valuables where they can be seen," he said in retrospect.

Witnesses have come forward to police describing what seems to be the UMass Minuteman as the sole thief of the vehicle.

Police are asking any students who may have knowledge concerning the disappearance of the vehicle or know of the whereabouts of the UMass mascot to come forward or call 1-800-GUILTY.

All information provided to the Public Safety Department will be released to the public at the earliest convenience of the Public Safety Department.

"At this time I do not wish to comment any further about my resignation, I just want to have conversations with the individuals involved in vandalizing my vehicle," Luippold said.

First time ever: SGA harmonious

By Zippy Carroll

After votes were tallied for the new University of Massachusetts Student Government Association (SGA) elections last night, Dan Parker was elected president and Erik Hansen was elected student trustee by close margins after being ousted in the last senate elections.

Parker passed a motion within an hour of being sworn in as president.

"I can't wait for the inaugural party. I've already passed a motion to take money out of the SGA accounts to pay for the kegs," Parker said.

Amherst Selectman Hill Boss showed his support for the motion by providing funding for cups at the gala.

"I provided the cups to show my support of high student- voter turnout. Like I've always said, alcohol is the answer to getting students involved in the election process," Boss said.

Hansen was enthusiastic about starting his term.

"I'm very excited about getting to be trustee. I heard you get your own office and a big desk," Hansen said.

It was a close race for both positions with a three-vote margin of victory for president and six vote margin for student trustee.

The close race produced feelings of comraderie among the candidates.

"I have to honestly say Dan is the best man for the job. He actually helped me put up my posters," presidential candidate Amy Casasanto said.

"I know with Erik in office students will see huge reductions in tuition. He just really seems to have his priorities in line," trustee candidate Eleanor Howe said.

The majority of the student body voted as a 95 percent voter turnout was tallied.

Speaker of the Senate Pete Kilbourne was enthusiastic about the turn out.

"This is the best damn turn out we've ever had. I think it's because this time all the students were allowed to vote," Kilbourne said.

GEO: still angry after all these years

By Anonymous

Twenty members of GEO tried to hold a sit–in on the floor of the Mullins Center last weekend, attempting to stop a UMass basketball game and force Chancellor David K. Scott to negotiate a new contract. After three days, a janitor informed GEO members that the basketball season was over and they had already ratified a new contract.

"This is just the first in a long line of disasters to come," said GEO spokesman Kookie Roberts.

In a related story there was an anti–GEO rally outside of the Mullins Center, as undergraduate students held signs condemning GEO, and chanting "Fk GEO."

Of course the anti–GEO rally was broken up by a rally to promote the new protesting policy on campus, but that was interrupted by an anti–protesting policy protest. This is not to be confused with the rally in support of rallying for an anti–protest policy rally, which was also conducted by students who were already protesting anti–protest policy rally ralliers.

GEO members finally found their way to Whitmore where they stood outside of Scott's office whining and complaining like little babies until Scott finally came out of his office. As the whining and complaining reached a deafening pitch, Scott reached under his coat revealing a sawed–off shotgun.

"Step off, unless you all want to be academically withdrawn David Scott style," the chancellor yelled. One bystander reportedly heard Scott say, "Yeah, Scott's gonna get medieval on your ass."

Tom Dooley, of the labor center criticized GEO for their crybaby tactics.

"GEO is a good organization they just have one big problem. They make everyone on campus hate them, and I don't think anyone gives a shit about them. It's hard to get support when no one gives a shit about you," Dooley said.

GEO members retreated from Whitmore. They went to the Amherst Elementary School where they bought automatic weapons from a fifth grader and vowed to return to Whitmore tomorrow morning.

In a related story GEO has announced a new program. If you bring in a gun, they will give you an earful of communist propaganda, no questions asked.

He's pissed because UPC "blew me off and told me to get lost 'cause I work for a big label," Davidson remarked. "Screw them though."

GEO staff members were upset about Scott using their budget, and voiced their opposition by writing "We want a new contract" all over campus.

"We may smell, we may whine, and we may be losers, but he can't just take our budget," said GEO member Stinky Hippie. "Give us a new contract, or we'll go on strike."

Scott said he'd didn't care about GEO.

"What a bunch of pansies," Scott said. "I'd like to write 'Shut up Stinky Hippie' in chalk on their faces."

Scott will be out of town for the next month, so Pancakes, Ho's and Dreams won't be open until May. In the mean time, Scott — an award–winning rapper who tours under the name Drunk Daddy and the Family, said he was going on a brief East Coast tour to support his new album Uptown Anthem— Drunk Daddy and the Family; featuring Lia Wong, The Notorious S.G.A., Lil' Kim and D.J. John Calipari, a benefit album to help all those harassed at Pruddy's a few weeks ago.

It's a fun album, one I hope helps the kids," Scott said. "We just had a good time, and the songs reflect that."

Financial aid gets FRIED

It's fast, it's friendly, and best of all, free

By Jack O'Lantern
Collegian Staff

In a sweeping series of moves, the University of Massachusetts has authorized the revamping of the financial aid process for undergraduate students. Spurred by a top secret memo sent by Vice Chancellor Moe Muny to the head of Financial Aid Dewie Cheetum, an exhaustive study was conducted during spring break at the annual "Bureaucracy is Better" meeting held in Panama City, Fla. The pilot program, known initially as Financial Reforms Intended to End Despair (FRIED), will commence in the fall semester.

"FRIED is going to set the national standard for financing college," a source close to the administration disclosed. "Hopefully, students will want to get FRIED. Nonetheless, we expect to have as many students FRIED as possible. Essentially, what we're talking about is going from 'financial aid' to 'financially made.'"

Among the changes proposed is the elimination of the Free Application for Federal Student Aid (FAFSA). Currently, FAFSA is the basis upon which all federal, state and University aid is determined. In the future students needing money will only have to present themselves at the University's financial aid office no later than two hours before classes to begin request funding.

Upon completion of a new and simple one–page form the student will then be sent to the Bursar's office to claim his or her check. Negotiations are running round the clock at this moment to convince the Bursar to appoint a permanent check writer to handle the expected throngs of FRIED students.

"We realized the current system isn't working out too well. It's not fair to the students and after all, that's why we are here," said Moe Muny.

"Pell grant, schmell grant," was the prevalent attitude overheard at the Panama City reunion. Since there will no longer be federal aid factored into the equation, UMass will have to bear the financial burden by itself.

As to where the University will generate the necessary income to independently finance students' financial needs, the most recent quarterly report indicates a surplus in revenue generated from various profit–making enterprises such as University Parking, computer accounts and the overdue library book fund.

"We've been screwing students for so long and what with the intense Florida sun and those really cool drinks with the little pink umbrellas, we decided it was time to give back," Cheetum said.

One other significant change in the financial aid policy will be the elimination of requiring monies disbursed to students to be used only for academic related activities. In the future, provided the student can remotely justify his or her request, the university will gleefully give out the money.

"Does this mean I can buy the new VW bug?" a bewildered and enthused student was asking at Whitmore.

"Oh my God, I'm headed to Martinique next year!" an elated sophomore exclaimed upon learning the news.

While the new and improved financial aid system is sure to cause a stir at other major public universities UMass is not content to rest on its laurels. According to a source who chose to remain anonymous, next up for the administration is implementing weekly beer and pizza nights to boost morale on campus, a controversial move destined to place UMass within the first tier of US News and World Report's annual college survey.

PVTA going your way from a galaxy far, far, far, far, far away

By "Rookie" Boobie Groupster
Ex–Con

It was discovered yesterday that the Pleasant Valley Transportation Authority (PVTA) is involved in a conspiracy with the United States Air Force to backward engineer alien technology to produce buses to destroy mass transit in our country.

The PVTA buses are made in Roswell, New Mexico the same place alien space vehicles crashed in 1947, and where alien bodies were recovered. The buses also resemble eyewitness reports of U.F.O. sightings in the area.

Roswell is also the sight of Area 51, where the U.S. Air Force is working with extra–terrestrials at the secretive base.

Charles DeMarr, and Lane Meyer said they have been working at Area 51 for 25 years. They said they worked closely with an alien code named "key–rock."

"Well, Key–Rock and his race, The Drada's, made a treaty with President Eisenhower in 1954," DeMarr said. "They would give us technology to destroy mass transit systems, and we would stay away from their space station on the dark side of the moon."

"Well, Key–Rock and his race, The Drada's, made a treaty with President Eisenhower in 1954, they would give us technology to destroy mass transit systems, and we would stay away from their space station on the dark side of the moon."

-Charles DeMarr

DeMarr also said Key–Rock would answer his questions telepathically. He said he would think of a question and the answer would pop into his head. During our interview DeMarr drank several beers and smoked a fat spliff.

Meyer said it took 20 years for the PVTA buses to be backward engineered from the original alien ships.

The original alien ships, Meyer said, were designed to fold space to travel between points anywhere in the universe instantaneously. He said the PVTA buses were also capable of this type of travel, and most student drivers are aware of this feature, although they are told to only use it in an emergency.

He also said there is also a device on the bus which makes it impossible for the driver to keep accurate time.

In addition there is a device which allows bus drivers to go out of service whenever there is anyone in dire need of a bus.

They said the purple lights in the buses are actually alien devices used for sucking the energy out of students, keeping them subservient throughout their college careers.

Meyer said the aliens had tried to abduct students, but were unable to learn anything from them.

DeMarr said there were rumors around the bases that several college administrators across the country had actually been replaced by alien doubles. He said the name David K. Scott had been mentioned as one of the administrators who had been replaced.

Key–Rock was unavailable for comment. Chancellor Scott's office said he was "off–campus." DeMarr and Meyer died from mysterious heart ailments before this story was published.

Warnings issued about cult dangers

Cult warning brings about responses

By Bryan Schwartzman
Collegian Staff

The letter and pamphlet that was sent to students by the University of Massachusetts administration regarding religious club practices has evoked a variety of responses from different groups.

The letter, which advised students of some warning signs associated with destructive religious groups, is sent out by the Dean of Students Office every few years.

Many of the recognized religious groups on campus were aware that the letter would be distributed and offered some input into its content.

On the back of the pamphlet, which accompanied the letter, the following organizations were listed as the recognized chaplains: African M.E. Zion Church, Alliance Christian Fellowship, Ark Episcopal Chaplaincy, Athletes in Action, Campus Crusade for Christ, Chabad House, Hillel Foundation, Intervarsity Christian Fellowship, Navigators Christian Fellowship, Newman Center, and the United Christian Foundation.

A mailing went out to all University of Massachusetts students last week warning them about dangerous religious groups recruiting students on campus.

Sent out by the Dean of Students office, the letter was accompanied by a pamphlet detailing the recognized campus chaplaincies and information on how to recognize a destructive religious group.

The brochure outlines some of the issues related to religious recruitment through high pressure tactics. "Everyone is, at some time, susceptible to these high pressure tactics," read the cover.

"Everyone is, at some time, susceptible to these high pressure tactics."

– UMass brochure which educates students about dangerous religious groups

"If any group approaches you on campus, you are free to request further information, to attend its meetings or to become a member. You are also free to say, 'No, thank you, I'm not interested,'" read the letter signed by Dean of Students and Associate Vice Chancellor for Student Affairs Jo–Anne T. Vanin.

A similar pamphlet has come out in the past and because of the constantly changing population at the University, Vanin wanted to issue another.

"We haven't done it in a couple of years. It's the kind of information we believe is important for students to have," Vanin said.

Students are urged to call the Dean of Students Office with any complaints about being pressured to join a group on campus. Recently, there have been complaints about specific groups which have been dealt with, according to Vanin.

"We've had some complaints over the past year and we've addressed them. Students are expressing a lot more interest in spirituality, and some groups [on campus] are not using appropriate methods for recruitment. If they are approached and feel pressured, students need to know where to go," Vanin said.

Many recognized religious groups on campus are also prepared to help students avoid becoming involved in a potentially dangerous situation.

"I've dealt with students who have experienced cult– natured groups. We are dealing with a particular group based in Springfield, and some of our concern comes from there. We're concerned about how much control emotionally the group has," said Rev. John Ike, from the UMass United Christian Foundation.

The pamphlet outlines the basic principles of mind control, including brainwashing, and gives phone numbers of those registered campus chaplaincies to go to for assistance.

According to Father Francis P. Lavelle, close to half the students on campus are baptized Roman Catholic, and many retain the faith through their college years.

"Many students hold fast to their faith and that is a safety device as far as

Sylvan resident reports UMass' second peeper to campus police

By Leigh Faulkner
Collegian Staff

For the second time in a week, University of Massachusetts Police are investigating reports of another peeping tom, this time in Sylvan Residential Area.

While responding to a report of a suspicious person in Brown Residence Hall at 2:40 a.m. Saturday, police were approached by a resident of Brown to report a male entering her room while she had been asleep.

The female victim described the perpetrator as an "Asian male, 5–foot–6 to 5–foot–8, medium build." The male may also be wearing eye glasses.

UMass Police Chief John Luippold said the suspicious individual was identified but did not appear to be related to the peeping tom incident.

While searching the building for the intruder, a second call was received that a male fitting the same description and weighing approximately 200 pounds was in "Cashin [Residence Hall] trying door handles to resident's rooms," Luippold said.

"The police officers went to Cashin and searched the building. They never came across the individual," Luippold said.

A third report was also made on Monday afternoon by a second female from Brown Residence Hall, claiming that a male had also entered her room around the same time as the first report.

"He opened the room and leaned over her bed. He did not touch her or say anything to her," Luippold said.

Due to the darkness, Luippold said the women was not able to give a description of the male. However, due to the time and place similarities to the first incident, Luippold thinks the two cases may be related.

Both incidents are under investigation.

Anyone who may have information regarding these incidents or knows of a male fitting the description who was in the Sylvan area early Saturday morning should call the UMass public safety department at 545–2121. Students may also call the anonymous crime tip line at 577–TIPS.

In addition, police are still investigating the peeping tom reported in the Southwest Residential Area last Thursday. The peeping tom, who was described as "a light skinned male, 5–foot–6 to 5–foot–10, dark hair and a possible moustache," was reported to have been taking pictures of women taking showers in John Quincy Adams and Kennedy Residence Hall, Luippold said.

Network to revive questionable cartoon

TOKYO (AP) — "Pocket Monsters" was one of the hottest kids' shows on TV, an action–packed cartoon that kept millions of Japanese children glued to their sets every Tuesday night. It was, in fact, too exciting. The cartoon was taken off the air in December after a visually intense episode sent at least 700 viewers to hospitals, many in convulsions.

Now, "Pokemon," as the series is called in Japan, is ready for a comeback.

TV Tokyo's decision to bring a toned–down version of the series back April 16 follows investigations by the network and the National Association of Commercial Broadcasters.

But as producers ready the new — and talk of possible syndication to the United States — questions remain about how far networks should be allowed to go in lacing children's programs with visual thrills such as those that attracted, and apparently sickened, so many children.

"This incident was something that hit us out of the blue," Hiroshi Uramoto, spokesman for the TV Tokyo network, said yesterday. "Before this case, there really weren't any rules regarding the use of visuals," he said.

FCC creates new toll–free code

WASHINGTON (AP) — Coming soon to a telephone near you: 1–877. The 877 prefix goes into use April 5 for toll–free calls, the Federal Communications Commission said yesterday. It will join the 800 and 888 numbers.

Some 34 billion toll–free calls are made each year in the United States, says MCI Communications Corp.

With yet another toll–free number on the horizon, the FCC also resolved a two–year–old question over how to distribute "vanity" numbers: Those numbers that, for instance, spell a company name, product or service.

The FCC decided vanity numbers in the new 877 prefix and future toll–free codes will be doled out on a first–come, first served basis.

But some vanity numbers in the 888 code will be treated differently. Two years ago, 374,199 vanity numbers using the 888 prefix were not distributed because some companies using the same vanity numbers with the original 800 prefix wanted them.

The FCC decided yesterday that those companies will get first dibs on the vanity number in the 888 prefix. But a company must act within a specified time frame — now expected to expire in mid–July — to reserve its 888 vanity number. If it doesn't, then the number will be given out in order of request, the FCC said.

The FCC could not provide examples of the 374,199 vanity numbers that were not distributed.

Wong appoints two to Judiciary

By Jill Carroll
Collegian Staff

University of Massachusetts Student Government Association (SGA) President Lia Wong last night appointed two students to the Student Judiciary, which will vote to ratify or nullify the senate elections on tomorrow night.

Bill Toffel and Ricardo Herrerias were appointed to fill the two vacant positions in the judiciary.

"I approved William W. Toffel and Ricardo Herrerias," Wong said.

The appointments will also have to be approved by the senate.

The Student Judiciary will be holding a hearing this tomorrow night to hear petitions filed during the senate elections. One of which is a petition to nullify the elections.

It was decided to leave the ratification or nullification of the elections up to the Student Judiciary because it is an internal issue.

"We decided to leave it to the Student Judiciary. This is why we want the Judiciary full to decide internal problems," Cook said.

There were four candidates for the two positions. The coordinating council interviewed the candidates last night and gave their suggestion to Wong, who had the final say.

"Basically the coordinating council will interview them and then recommend to Lia who they want. Lia has the ultimate say," Lisa Cook, associate speaker of the senate, said.

The council also interviewed the candidates for half an

Student to compete in nationals

Christine Maxwell in action yesterday afternoon in the Student Union games room.

By Jason Eiseman
Collegian Staff

Normally it takes a long time for someone to become one of the best in a certain field, especially in sports. It takes dedication, hours of practice and a desire to strive for the top.

Maybe the dedication it takes to become the best is why it is unusual someone like University of Massachusetts sophomore Christine Maxwell excels in pocket billiards. She is shy and soft spoken, she doesn't practice every day, but in just a few weeks she will play against some of the best nine- ball players in the country.

After winning the New England championships in New Hampshire, 20-year-old Maxwell is looking for a national championship in Green Bay, Wis. She has made the sweet 16 of the national tournament. Though she's only been playing the sport for four years, she is already excelling in it.

Getting started

"The first time I picked up a stick I missed the cue ball," Maxwell said. "I don't like not knowing how to do things. I just liked it and kept up with it."

Even in high school she was playing in leagues in tournaments with players much older and more experienced than herself. She said the owner of a pool hall in her hometown of Natick taught her a lot about the game of pool, and she would like to see herself do the same thing in the future.

"I want to own a pool hall," Maxwell said. "The guy in my hometown, he just plays pool and plays cards."

She said she tried to play for money in her hometown, but it didn't work out.

"I did a couple of times back home. They wouldn't pay me, so I stopped," Maxwell said.

The Nationals

Maxwell said she is looking forward to the national championships, but is also nervous.

"I have no idea what the competition is going to be like there," she said. "I've never played anyone other than local [players]."

Maxwell is the only representative from UMass going to the nationals, although fellow UMass student Angela Payne finished second at the regionals in New Hampshire.

Maxwell placed as one of the top 16 players in the country by winning her regional.

"I'm playing more because I've been working here," Maxwell said, referring to her job at Union Billiards. "I'm here by myself, and a lot of good players come in." Maxwell said she plays for about five hours when she works.

All players are responsible for funding their own trip to Green Bay for the championship, and Maxwell found help from the Campus Center and the University Store.

"The Campus Center Administration and Elizabeth Dale, Director of Business and Facilities Services, are happy to underwrite Maxwell's travel expenses to Green Bay, Wis.," said a letter written to Strider Rubeck of Union Billiards. "This is just one of the ways profits from the University Bookstore goes to give assistance to students."

Even with her trip to the nationals planned and her spot in the sweet 16 sealed up, she is not practicing as much as some might expect. She said that classes are still her most important priority, despite her success at nine-ball.

"It's hard in the dorms," she said. "Too many people are using the table. Some days I would like to practice, but I have a quiz in the morning. My classes come first." Maxwell is currently undeclared and is trying to become a School of Management major.

The love

"It's a game that every time you play it, you learn something," Maxwell said. Despite the image of nine-ball being played in smoky pool halls by men, her parents do not have a problem with her devotion to billiards and support her.

She still says she has a long way to go to becoming a nine-ball champion.

"I could play for years, and not be at the point I want to be at," Maxwell said.

She said she has thought about playing professional, but does not think she is at a high enough playing level yet.

"I watch the women play and they just amaze me," Maxwell said. "I'm not even close to the point they're at."

getting involved in cults. What I've noticed is that young people who stop practicing their faith and start looking around are attracted to these groups," Lavelle said.

"Sometimes cult people have this radar and they are able to pick these people out. I don't want to encourage students to be impolite or rude, but they should say they aren't interested," Lavelle said.

Rabbi Chaim Adelman of Chabad House, believes that it is the responsibility of the University to protect students from dangerous groups.

"I'm aware these groups are on campus, but I've not really had much personal experience. It's our responsibility, the college and the administration, to protect individuals and make them aware. We are morally responsible to provide a healthy environment," Adelman said.

"If students are approached, they need to seek guidance and get more background on the group," Adelman said.

Any students who believe they or someone they know is being pressured to attend or join a group, they should report it to the Dean of Students Office, 227 Whitmore Administration Building, or call 545-2684.

The chaplain for the Upside Down Club, the Boston Church of Jesus Christ, was recognized after the pamphlet was published.

"We get two to three complaints a year, and they have all been resolved," said Merle Ryan, the Chair of the Religious Activities Committee, which is under Student Affairs.

Ryan said the complaints received are all from groups with recognized chaplains, but she would not comment on specific groups.

"We saw the letter and liked it," said David Thom, the Minister for Athletes in Action, a division of Campus Crusade for Christ.

"We are too busy to bother people that don't want to be bothered," he said.

Thom said that his groups attracts members to their weekly meetings by postering, handing out surveys and speaking to coaches and athletic teams.

"The life of a student-athlete is very different from that of a normal person, we are a Bible-based, non-denominational group which brings people from different denominations together," Thom said.

These recognized chaplains should not be confused with Registered Student Organizations (RSOs), but many of these groups, such as the Hillel Foundation, have a corresponding RSO. However, RSOs such as the Muslim Student Organization are affected by this letter even though they do not have a recognized chaplain.

Kamran Muhammad of the Muslim Students Organization said he could not comment on the letter because the group was meeting to discuss its implications.

Students not involved in a particular group expressed a range of views on the letter and on groups themselves.

"[The letter] was a waste of money. I understand why it was done, but I haven't seen it as a problem on campus," Brian Costello, an undeclared freshman said.

Tony Smith, a junior economics major said he has been approached by groups and has been bothered repeatedly after he has declined interest.

"[The letter] was a good idea. It gets the message out that it's their right to express what their beliefs are, but they have to adhere to the wishes of others."

"Sunday they had half-hour interviews with the four. They [coordinating council] came to a consensus on the first and fourth but couldn't decided who should be second and third [choice]," Cook said.

A past appointment to the Student Judiciary was denied at the SGA meeting March 11 over controversy that the appointee was biased towards a partisan group in the senate.

"Some [SGA presidential and student trustee] candidates were doubtful about my appointments," Wong said.

Wong put the appointments through due process in order to avoid doubt about them.

"To make sure there was due process I put them [candidates for Student Judiciary] through the Student Judiciary Ad-hoc Committee," Wong said.

Cook said the candidates do not have an affiliation with any partisan group in the senate.

"They were taken from 30 people who are not on either side. They weren't brought to Lia by either side," Cook said.

A dangerous precedent

OK, computer

Seema Gangatirkar

My computer and I, we've got this understanding — I don't mess with it and it doesn't give me any lip.

Basically, my computer and I have survived some bloody battles; at one point our relationship was menaced by some serious misunderstandings. I kept asking it to change, go faster, do this, do that. My computer just wanted to be its own machine, do its own thing.

But after a counseling session last spring, we reached the previously mentioned agreement, which is all fine and dandy. Now we get along great.

I'm telling you all this to explain my phobia of all things computer-related. I think this phobia began a couple years ago when I first found myself in a computer science class. Ideally, telling a collection of circuits and chips what to do ought to be simple, kind of like telling little kids to pick up their toys or to stop picking their nose. But programming isn't like that.

I knew I was in trouble when I couldn't get the computer to add two and three and get five. Usually a comma or a misplaced semi-colon was to blame, but damn it took forever to find the little bugger. By then, most of my hair had turned gray and I swore that I would never get near a computer again.

The kicker came on our final assignment, in which we had to create a full-fledged dating service. My dating service was going well until the moment when it actually came to matching people up and then I realized the fatal error: no matter who you were, your perfect date was always George Bush. There was no avoiding it. If you used Seema's Dating Service, you were spending a night on the town with George Bush.

After that experience, I shied away from the whole programming deal. But then, as I started looking for a job, I realized that knowing another language was key to success. It didn't matter whether you coded in Java, C++ or whatever else was out there; it just mattered you could code something.

So over Spring Break, I made up my mind to apply myself seriously to the study of computer science. Since "object- oriented programming" seemed to be the buzz phrase of choice, I decided to learn C++.

So I went out and bought an extremely informative book labeled Learn C++ in 24 Hours. Now, it takes most people a couple semesters to learn C++; I don't know what I was smoking when I thought that 24 hours would be good enough for me. Heck, I figured I was a fast enough reader to actually half the learning time in about 12 hours.

In chapter one, I learned all about C++ and thought, "Hey, this ain't so bad." By chapter two, that object-oriented programming stuff was digested. Chapter three raised my eyebrows and by chapter four, I knew why I wasn't a computer science major. By chapter five, I had returned the book to the store.

But I wasn't done yet with my foray into computer science. Armed with my new but scanty knowledge of C++, I then decided to proceed with HTML.

HTML is the language of the Web, and in marketing, the Web is the new "it" medium and God forbid if I missed the "it" revolution. Well-intentioned friends told me that any moron could program in HTML and, putting myself in "any moron" mode, I got a book and proceeded to read it while drinking iced-coffee at a bus stop. By the Hampshire Mall, I knew how to make line-breaks. At Amherst College, I was up to changing background color. And by Haigis Mall, I was thinking, I can do this.

So I spent this past weekend assembling my web page. People told me it was beautiful outdoors, but the high of actually writing HTML and having it work was too hard to resist, especially after the George Bush disaster.

So, now not only do I have a decent relationship with my computer, I also have a simple but passable web page, which will hopefully attract an employer my way. One thing I'm sure of: no dating service will ever hire me.

Monkey read, monkey call

C. Taylor Conner

Somebody's dead or dying.

When the phone rings in the dead of night, one of these scenarios must be at hand. You bolt upright from slumber in anticipation of the worst, but thankfully tragedy seldom awaits on the other end of the line. Usually, it's something as harmless as an intoxicated friend or a wrong number.

And then there was my 2:30 a.m. call last Thursday.

This is a true story. Two chumps, both quite certainly drunk out of their melons, phoned me that evening (or morning, as it were) to engage in agitated discourse about last week's column, "Canning the Man (3/25)." They were so offended by the content of the piece — which dealt with the humorous side of a stereotype — that they opted to ring me at their most eloquent juncture.

That juncture, of course, was 2:30 a.m. after what was probably a filthy white-hatted, Natty Light bender of Dionysian proportions.

Anyway, so Philosophe Numero Un hops on the phone first, accusing me of fostering reverse racism and muttering some other drivel about white supremacists. Following that intellectual bombast, he handed the phone over to his fellow Mensa brother-in-alarmism. This conversation ended with a kicker. A brief transcript, if you will:

M.F. Calling Too Late: I just thought it was really offensive, you know?

Me: Well, it was just a humor piece. I'm sorry if you felt that way. But I hope it was clear if you read the whole thing that it was a humor piece.

M.F.C.T.L.: Well, I didn't read the whole thing.

Me: Pardon?

M.F.C.T.L.: We only read the first couple of lines.

Me: (with faux civility) I'm sure if you finished it, you'd see what I was going for. But thanks for calling. Feedback is good.

These sorts of incidents reinforce the type of things I don't talk about at parties. I have several allergies, among them pollen, animal hair and grossly stupid people. But I'd rather have a Golden Retriever who'd jurt wet-rolled in a patch of dandelions jump on my face than deal with real morons.

And I'm not talking about the sort of knuckleheads that might commonly spring to mind. There are plenty of book- smart folks who can't distinguish the "Enter" from the "Exit" door in the supermarket, and a good number of street- smart kids who think Molière is French for "beauty mark." They don't bother me because there usually isn't any lunkheaded, malicious aforethought.

I'm really addressing true idiocy like that of the Wonder Twins who roused me from sleep last week. People whose lips part, tongue rolls, larynx vibrates and yet nothing of any redeeming value comes out. These are the reps of the Clueless Collective (or "C.C." for short).

My resentment of the C.C. runs deeply for so many reasons. I'm not even sure my always burgeoning frustration allows me to put succinctly how I feel about the matter anymore. Perhaps the best way to attack the issue is to break down precisely, via usage of Thursday's conversation, what it takes to be a Class A craphead:

1) Establish your hollowness right off the bat: Don't hesitate to make your shallowness apparent from the start. The first guy on the phone let me know within 15 seconds that he didn't have the slightest sense of irony, and that he probably finds Jim Carrey's shtick a little dry for his tastes.

2) Never begin a clear or coherent argument: Where most people start using B.S. as filler is where you start. This means, in our scenario, that you can start rambling about how your grandparents and great-grandparents were racists and then support your liberal family tree by slurring something about white supremacists. Perfectly, chillingly nonsensical.

3) Justify your pointless point with more pointlessness: The telephone duo did this expertly. By mentioning to me just how many black friends they have, these schlubs were able to get the job done swiftly and without approaching anything remotely close to relevance. The "logic" in their statement: "We know Negroes, so we can't be total wastes of oxygen." Couldn't have done it better myself.

4) Reveal your complete and thorough lack of thought: This is without a doubt the most important element of the C.C. process. It is at this place that you must inform your opponent that all of your contentions are from the valley of the uninformed. Once again, my new pals nailed that bad boy shut. Genius Number Two's admission that he and his crony hadn't even forged beyond the first few lines was the final and master stroke of their reactionary obtuseness. A+.

But at the same time, they get an F— for having the thickness of a five-dollar milkshake. I'm not a true misanthrope, but sometimes people make it so damn hard. You tend to forget the bunches of good apples out there when the bad ones fall off the tree and clock you upside the head on a frequent basis. Then again, if that famed fruit hadn't whupped up on Isaac Newton, think where modern physics would be.

In other words, maybe we need the occasional monkey- brain to remind us to keep our minds in motion.

C. Taylor Conner is a Collegian columnist.

The need for evaluations

In one of the Student Government Association's (SGA's) finer moments, it managed to come up with a proposal that would really benefit students. The Course And Teacher Evaluation (CATE) would allow students access to evaluations completed at the end of the semester by those who had taken the course. For those of us who have sat through a semester of painfully boring lectures, the benefits are obvious.

Every pre-registration period, I have the same dilemma: I can find countless classes that look interesting, but can only fit five into my schedule. So I want those five to be good. This semester I hit paydirt, but last semester was a big letdown. I took one course with a professor obviously not cut out for teaching. He drearily spent each class reviewing what the book had already told us, and only what the book had already told us. I survived by reminding myself that at least I was fulfilling Gen Ed.

More painful was the course that I'd supposedly chosen merely out of interest. Two weeks into the class, that interest had fizzled. I was stuck with a pacer and a mumbler; a rambler who attempted to introduce neophytes to an arcane and foreign literary tradition simply by talking at us for two and a half hours each week.

To make matters worse, last semester was my first. With two out of my four professors boring the tar out of me, I wasn't too thrilled with the prospect of spending another seven semesters here. I nearly transferred.

The CATE would have been invaluable to me. Incoming freshmen have no idea which courses will be the one that changes their lives and which will put them to sleep. Upperclassmen have a slight advantage, but still must wade through the prejudices of their friends when making their decisions. The CATE would allow students to do exactly what they're supposed to be doing: think for themselves. When buying a car or a dishwasher a consumer has tons of information with which to make a decision. When picking a professor, a student should have the same advantage.

It's an advantage many others enjoy. Smith College, for instance, publishes a booklet outlining the responses to student evaluations, as well as printing representative comments about each class. This approach runs the risk of giving especially negative responses undue influence. But one negative comment in a sea of positives would barely be noticed by a student considering the course.

Unfortunately, the faculty at UMass seems to be threatened by CATE. According to an article printed in the March 27 Collegian, the Faculty Senate is attempting to block the proposal from being implemented. It makes sense that the faculty would be threatened; it promises to make all of their shortcomings public. But it also promises to proclaim their successes.

> "CATE would help ensure that students can pick faculty members whose styles they'll benefit from, and that they'll respond positively to."
> Gerrit DeYoung

CATE would benefit faculty as well as students. Having a class of disappointed, surly 19-year-olds can't be pleasant. CATE would help ensure that students can pick faculty members whose styles they'll benefit from, and that they'll respond positively to. It will also give departments valuable information when it needs to decide which professors to promote, or to offer tenure.

The Faculty Senate should stop blocking this proposal. It's vital that students are able to make informed decisions when picking their classes, especially when there are so many to choose from. Students need to be assured that they're choosing classes that will interest them, and professors need to know that the students they're having in class are going to be interested and active. It's a win-win situation, but only if the faculty has the courage to let it happen.

Gerrit DeYoung is a UMass student.

Ed/Op is looking for new writers!

The Ed/Op desk is currently seeking new columnists. The way to get involved is by submitting pieces for us to consider publishing. They should be 600–800 words long, well–written and have a point. There are no restrictions on topics, but we are especially interested in pieces on campus politics, satire and work that takes an unexpected perspective.

Editorials can be submitted by e-mailing letters@oitvms.oit.umass.edu or in person to the Collegian offices in the Campus Center basement. Call Tamar Carroll at 545–1491 for more information.

We're looking for columns about the SGA for next week. What do you have to say about SGA's future, how it can reform itself or how could it be more useful to the student body? Any columns should be about 800 words, typed and spell–checked and brought to the Collegian office at 113 Campus Center basement or e-mailed to letters@oitvms.oit.umass.edu, by Monday at noon. Call Tamar Carroll or Mike Menarus at 545–1491 for more information.

Letters to the Editor

The current state of SGA

To the editor:

This letter is to clarify the situation concerning the trustee and president elections held on March 11 and 12. There is currently no "president–elect" or "trustee–elect."

This election has not been ratified. The senate cannot ratify it because it never received the full official report from the Election Commission within the designated 48 hours from the completion of the official tally of the results.

There were a number of occurrences during the elections that can possibly make the elections invalid. There are petitions filed with the Student Judiciary pertaining to the validity of the procedure under which this election was held. These petitions allege that the elections violated a trustee document (the constitution and bylaws of SGA), which is a state law.

There was an emergency meeting held Tuesday night, March 23, to address this situation. In attendance were members of the SGA leadership, Chuck DiMare (Director of the Student Legal Services and Chief Legal Consul to the SGA), trustee and presidential candidates, (including Elly Court and Amy Pellegrino, who came out with the most votes as trustee and president, respectively), and campaign workers. There was a consensus reached at this meeting to have the Judiciary decide whether the elections were illegal or not.

Bound under this agreement of consensus, no candidate or other individuals may claim the validity of the elections and what it encompasses, implies or empowers until the Judiciary has made a ruling.

The Judiciary will hold a hearing for the petitions on Thursday, April 2. At this meeting, the Judiciary will hear the statements from all parties involved in the alleged act of grievance(s). Following this, the Judiciary will go into deliberative session to rule on the information obtained from the hearing(s). This is when the Judiciary decides whether the petitions submitted were substantiated and whether the election of March 9 and 10 was legal or not. No decision or assumptions can be made until the Judiciary has made a ruling on these petitions.

Chuck DiMare has advised the senate and those present at the Tuesday night meeting "that if you believe that even 10 percent of the allegations of misconduct during the elections are provable, then it is likely some authority will over–turn these elections at some time." He also said that "it would be in the best interest of the SGA not to ratify the elections right now and let the Judiciary make a determination as soon as possible or we may have a constitutional crisis to deal with." There is a chance of another election this semester to recast the ballot. This second election has not yet been decided on.

Since the election has not been ratified, there is a procedure defined in the constitution and bylaws of the Student Government Association that fills the position of president in the event that it becomes vacant in the absence of a popularly elected president. A popularly elected president is recognized under the conditions that the elections in which he/she is elected are ratified by the SGA Senate.

The presidential term of President Lia Wong ended yesterday, March 31. Due to the current circumstances, there is no elected successor. As of today, April 1, Peter Kilbourne, the speaker of the senate will move up to the positions of president. Lisa Cook, the associate speaker, will become speaker once Kilbourne becomes president. This will remain until a decision is made as to whether the elections were valid or that another election needs to be held.

Cheap oil drilling may create an era of bargain fuel prices

By Dirk Beveridge
Associated Press

LONDON — When the oil market collapsed this winter, OPEC and other producers got hammered and consumers enjoyed unusually cheap gasoline prices.

But while the drastic price swings for the world's most vital commodity made headlines, a revolution in the way big oil companies find and produce their crude has more quietly been keeping prices lower and expanding the pool of oil available for future generations.

Adjusting prices for inflation, the cost of finding a barrel of oil offshore in the United States was $24.81 at its peak in 1981, but had slipped to $5.21 by 1996, according to the U.S. Department of Energy's Energy Information Administration.

The total cost of producing oil, both onshore and offshore in the United States, dropped from $14.61 in 1981 to $4.12 in 1996, the EIA said.

Major oil producers from the West are finding cheaper ways to produce crude in hostile environments like the North Sea, enabling them to better compete with OPEC producers and their ultra-low cost, oil-rich fields of the Persian Gulf.

The innovations let the Western oil companies pump from some fields that previously would have been written off as impossible, while increasing the life and production of others.

The cheap production costs help keep a lid on prices that have been decreasing for years in real terms. When U.S. motorists filled up recently on gasoline that sometimes cost less than $1 per gallon, they paid prices they might have paid in the late 1970s — with zero adjustment for inflation.

In real terms, some experts said, fuel was as cheap as it's ever been.

The lower costs start at the wellhead. An example: Texaco discovered the Captain Field in the North Sea two decades ago, but the oil was heavy and there was little ground pressure to let it flow. Texaco did nothing with the field for years.

"Up until the early '90s, it was really at the bottom of our portfolio," spokesman Andy Norman said.

But oil companies improved three technologies — horizontal drilling, floating production and electrical submersible pumps — and, eventually, the Captain Field was looking like less of an ugly duckling.

"It's now onstream, producing 70,000 barrels a day," Norman said.

Many of the offshore drilling technologies were pioneered by Shell in the Gulf of Mexico.

They quickly spread elsewhere, improving the way Big Oil and also medium-sized production companies get crude in not only the North Sea but also offshore Brazil, offshore West Africa and other areas that previously were technologically off-limits.

Tim Davies, a project manager who runs 30 North Sea wells for British Petroleum, said his company produces more oil from horizontal wells, where the drilling equipment can move at a shallow angle through oil formations, finding the best places to extract the crude.

Often the oil can be pumped from several places along the line, getting more out at the cost of drilling just one hole. Oil companies can never hope to get every drop of oil out of a field, but now they can get a greater proportion.

"Whatever the shape of the reservoir under the ground, you just follow it," Davies said. "You can steer up, down, sideways or whatever way you need to go."

The oil companies can trot out example after example of how they're doing better, but some critics say the numbers aren't all that they seem.

Colin Campbell, a former Amoco and Fina man who worked in the Norwegian North Sea, said companies often can make big boasts about improvements to their projects because they start out with very conservative estimates of how much oil they might get.

That way, the geologists and engineers avoid getting into trouble by staking their reputations on overly optimistic estimates of a drilling prospect.

"You start with a lower number," Campbell said. "The performance improves all the time — there's medals and champagne for something that gets better all the time. It's just a maze of confusion and doubletalk — and, also, no audit."

Not necessarily so, said Davies at British Petroleum. He said oil executives now start out with much higher estimates for the amount of crude they can get from a new field.

"The amount of recoverable reserve is going up and up and up with the new technologies," Davies said. "Before, you might have thought 40 percent was a good target. Now, people are looking at 60 percent or 80 percent."

Since the mid-1980s, three-dimensional seismic studies have helped the seven biggest oil companies — Exxon, Shell, British Petroleum, Mobil, Texaco, Amoco and Chevron — reduce the number of dry holes, or wells that produce no oil, by 28 percent, according to Leo Drollas, chief economist at the Center for Global Energy Studies in London.

Meanwhile, the cost of that technology has fallen by 60 percent over the last four years.

Drollas said offshore production costs also are plunging. He compares two Norwegian projects — the Heidrun Field, which was brought onstream in 1995, and the Norne Field, brought onstream in 1997.

The Heidrun Field uses what is known as a tension oil platform, which ws floated into place and has produced oil at a cost of $6 per barrel.

The Norne Field uses a state-of-the-art floating production system, where a ship kept in place by a satellite controls drilling equipment that is set up under the sea.

The cost per barrel: $3.30.

"Ten years ago, that would have been unheard of," Drollas said. "Twenty years ago, you wouldn't have even dreamed of it." Using the satellite-guided ships is considerably cheaper in start-up costs, and the equipment is easier to dismantle when production stops. Even the new technology can't do anything about a field that finally runs out of oil.

Large study exonerates diet pill Redux as major cause of heart valve damage

By Daniel Q. Haney
Associated Press

ATLANTA — A large study released yesterday found no sign that brief use of the diet pill Redux caused dangerously leaky heart valves, as many feared when the medicine was withdrawn from the market last September.

The study, conducted at Georgetown University, appears to largely exonerate Redux, a prescription appetite suppressant. It found the medicine is no more likely than sugar pills to seriously harm the heart during the two or three months that most people took it.

However, it did not rule out the possibility that taking Redux for many months — as the drug was intended to be used — could have harmed people. It also did not examine whether the chemically similar phen-fen, which was pulled from drugstores at the same time as Redux, is bad for the heart valves.

"These results should be reassuring for the majority of patients who have been on Redux," said Dr. Neil J. Weissman, who directed the study.

His study is the first large, carefully controlled experiment to see whether Redux truly caused the damage that many suspected. Wyeth-Ayerst Laboratories, which makes Redux and fenfluramine — the fen of phen-fen — pulled both drugs off the market at the request of the Food and Drug Administration. The government acted after a Mayo Clinic team reported 24 cases of heart valve problems among people taking phen-fen.

Government agencies eventually gathered several hundred cases of damaged heart valves among people taking phen-fen and Redux. Such reports cannot prove that the diet pills actually caused the valve damage. However, the FDA estimated that one-third of people taking the diet pills could have suffered significant heart valve damage as a result.

Dr. Janet Woodcock of the FDA said that while the study "is reassuring for people who took it for a short period of time," the study does not settle the question of what happened to those who used it longer. She said the FDA believes this is where most of the harm occurred.

Dr. Curt Furberg of Wake Forest University, a member of an expert panel assembled by Wheth-Ayerst to help design studies of the drugs' effects, said the Georgetown study "meets the highest scientific standards we have."

The results were presented at a meeting of the American College of Cardiology.

The study involved 1,072 overweight men and women who had been involved in testing of a new, sustained-release form of Redux. They were randomly assigned to take regular Redux, the new form of Redux or dummy pills. Neither the doctors nor the patients knew which they were getting.

The study was stopped when Redux was taken off the market. The patients were then give echocardiograms to look at their heart valves. The doctors who read their scans did not know which treatment they had received.

The results showed no significant difference in the three groups in the kind of serious valve damage that the FDA had warned of in Redux patients.

The study found mild or worse leaking of the aortic valve in 5 percent of patients on Redux, 5.8 percent on sustained-released Redux and 3.6 percent on placebos. It found moderate or greater mitral valve leaking in 1.7 percent on Redux, 1.8 percent on sustained-release Redux and 1.2 percent on placebos. The small differences were not considered statistically meaningful.

The study showed — as heart experts already know — that trivial valve leaking can be found with sophisticated diagnostic machines in almost everyone, even though this was somewhat more common among those getting Redux. It found 50 percent of Redux users and 48 percent on placebo had slight valve leakage.

The patients took the drug for an average of 77 days, which is about the same as three-quarters of Redux patients used the medicine.

The findings are unlikely to quell all of the furor over Redux. "This leaves the false impression that these drugs are safe," said Guerry Thornton, an Atlanta attorney who has filed lawsuits for women who used them.

Dr. Richard Bowen of Naples, Fla., who sent 122 cases of apparent valve damage to the FDA, said that while new data are reassuring to those who used the drug briefly, he worries that valve problems may be more common among those who took the drug longer.

Dr. Philip J. de Vane of Wyeth-Ayerst said the company has decided not to reintroduce Redux. "Given the legal environment, it doesn't make any sense," he said.

Suspect in estranged wife's slaying gives interview and kills himself

DEARBORN, Mich. — A man killed his estranged wife yesterday and said he would surrender after talking to a TV reporter. He confessed during the interview, which he ended abruptly by going inside his home and fatally shooting himself.

Shortly after midnight, police answered a shooting call at AAA-Michigan headquarters and found Donna Sinishtaj, 32, in her car with a gunshot wound. She had just completed her shift as an emergency service operator.

She died several hours later at a hospital.

Ms. Sinishtaj had obtained a personal protection order against her husband six days earlier in response to his threats against her, police in this Detroit suburb said.

"Due to a past history of domestic violence, the victim's ex-husband, Alex Sinishtaj, became the prime suspect." Police Chief Ronald Deziel said.

At about 10 a.m., Sinishtaj, 50, called television station WXYZ-TV in Southfield and asked to speak to a reporter at his Detroit apartment, Deziel said. The station called police, who went to the home.

Police allowed Sinishtaj to be interviewed. The station said he agreed to surrender after talking with a reporter.

"What happened, I did shoot my wife," he told the station as he stood in the hallway of his apartment building. "Me and her we are together.... 17 years. I did trust her, I did care for her."

Deziel said Sinishtaj "further attempted to justify his actions, then abruptly ended the interview, closed the apartment door and fatally shot himself."

The couple's two children, ages 9 and 12, were placed in a foster home, he said.

Although plagued by technical problems, Curve managed to take the crowd at Boston's Axis for a wild ride Monday night.

The Axis
Mar. 30

BOSTON — The line to get into Axis stretched the length of Lansdowne Street (on a Monday night!) as Curve brought their hard-edged technorock to Boston. Although their set was plagued with technical problems, Curve put forth an intense show that gripped the capacity crowd and refused to let it go.

From the start of the opening DJ's set, the audience was a seething cauldron of energy, but the excitement of the crowd paled in comparison to the exuberance emitted by Curve when they took stage.

Through a haze of thick artificial fog and a blinding light show that spelled danger for anyone with epilepsy, core members Dean Garcia and Toni Halliday exerted a presence that left everyone in the house awestruck. With Garcia on bass and Halliday on vocals, Curve was joined on stage by a guitarist and drummer. Curve jumped into their set with music that was more guitar driven than electronica induced.

Despite the prominence of the guitar sounds, Curve seemed

Global Divas perform at Bowker

By Emily Trask
Collegian Staff

This Thursday, April 2 at 8 p.m., the Fine Arts Center Series will present Global Divas in Bowker Auditorium. The program promises to bring together three extraordinary women from diverse cultural and geographical settings.

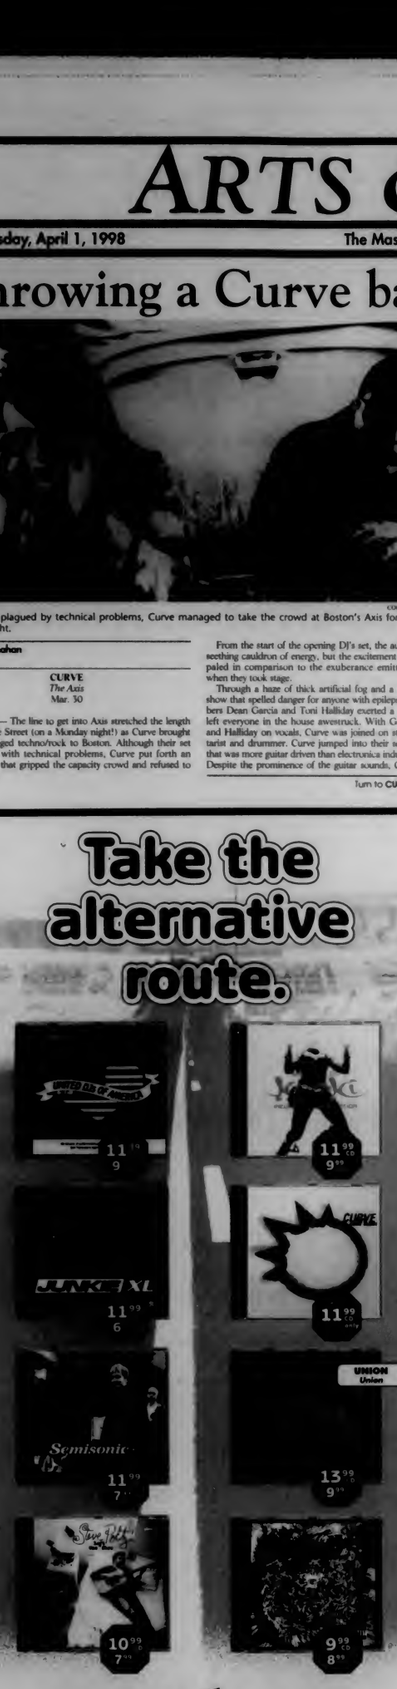
These divas include Stella Chiweshe from Zimbabwe, Susan Baca from Peru and Tish Hinojosa from Texas. Although they are all unique in their experiences, the three still have much in common. Coming from cultures in the midst of far-reaching transition, all three have had to overcome cultural boundaries to challenge the barriers that exist between people of different cultural heritages.

During this tour, all three women will grace stages across America, but individually, each artist will speak to a small group allowing her art to find expression in the most intimate way possible.

Among the three Global Divas, Chiweshe is distinctive in that she grew up in a strictly traditional culture, intact centuries before her birth. The Shona people of Zimbabwe have a proud history, especially known for its profound spiritual tradition. A master of the mbira, a 22-pronged hand piano, Chiweshe combines this deep, living traditional art, ancient religion and her own innovations to produce her music.

For both Baca and Hinojosa, in order to discover their ancestral heritage, they have had to dig through histories that have been all but buried. Baca was raised knowing that she was descended from Africans. But her country, Peru, denied its African past. She found the core of her Afro–Peruvian music by exploring the memories of her parents and of old people who still retained fragments of the puzzle. The music Baca has unearthed, reconstructed and transformed from a new era will never be lost again.

Hinojosa found her inspiration and material in the diverse cultural background of South Texas, where Native Americans, Mexican immigrants, cowboys and descendants of European settlers all contribute to the rich, cultural fabric of the American Southwest. Inspired by folk, rock, and country icons of the '60s, Hinojosa created a music that allowed her own Mexican heritage shine through modern music.



Tickets for Global Divas are $20 and $15. Tickets for ages 17 and under are $8 and tickets for Five College students are $5. For tickets and information cal (413) 545-2511 or 1–800–999–UMAS. Parking is available in the adjacent Campus Center Parking Garage for $1 with remittance of FAC concert ticket stub.

Ex–Judas Priest frontman returns with overhauled sound

COURTESY JOHN EDER

Former Judas Priest frontman Rob Halford returns with a new look and a different sound.

VOYEURS
Two
Nothing/Interscope

Artistic transformations in the world of rock 'n roll are nothing new. Hell, David Bowie shows his diverse musical colors more often than Joseph's Technicolor dreamcoat. The complete changeover of former Judas Priest badboy Rob Halford to an almost gothic industrial maven has got to be a first.

On the surface, Halford's new allegiance to Trent Reznor's Nothing label may seem a crassly contrived ploy to recapture some of his '80s hipness and glory. Scratch a little deeper though, and the 1998 version of Rob Halford is revealed to be a complex character, struggling to cope with a day–to–day life that changes at a blinding pace. Perhaps that's why Halford called the album Voyeurs: throughout he just seems to be relishing in the view. Sometimes, it's nice to simply look.

Indeed, much of the album concentrates on Halford's emotion and distorted perception rather than a full–on approach favored by his former band. What makes Voyeurs an intriguing release is Halford's ability to make the unmemorable memorable. From the dream sequence of "Stutter Kiss" (an oblique ode to Gene Simmons and Paul Stanley, perhaps?) to the fatalistic futility on "Leave Me Alone" and "Bed of Rust," Halford manages to weave slight meanings into intriguing tales of society.

With Trent Reznor and Dave "Rave" Ogilve working on the album's production, the sonic quality achieved by Two is often a little bogged down in '90s–style industrial overkill, which is a shame considering Halford's expressive voice. "I Am a Pig" is a killer single, but its immediacy is hindered through the stiff, glossed–over production of Ogilve. Still, not a bad debut. B (Marty Keane)

Trax On Trax Off

PIECES OF A MAN
AZ
Nuo Trybe

It's a good thing for AZ that the Firm doesn't have a patent on their style of lyrics or he would be out of a job. On Pieces of a Man, AZ does not attempt to bring anything new to the table, instead he relies on stories about gangs and a mafioso lifestyle to get his point across. On the other hand it's a good thing that AZ has some skill and a whole sack of beats to toss at you.

"I'm Known," the first track, cops its line from the movie Donnie Brasco with its chorus of "I'm known in every borough, forget about it, I'm known throughout the world." The thing is that line would have been a lot funnier if you couldn't see it coming from a mile away. "Trading Places" runs this disc with its calypso beat played out on a steel drum. It's the perfect jam for a summer barbecue.

AZ flexes his lyrical muscles on this album, bringing his stories to life. He is blessed with the ability to really have movie reels running through your head on tracks such as "The Pay Back," "Trial of the Century" and "Pieces of a Black Man." While not up to the level of Nas, AZ is only living a couple of doors down.

While it is obvious that AZ can spit, you have to wonder why he spits re–runs of stories we've all heard before. He does the same thing a lot of other people are doing and it all sounds lame to these ears. It's a shame. I thought AZ was better than that. B– (Adam Dlugacz)

IN THE GLOAMING
Jolene
Sire

In the Gloaming, the new release from North Carolina rock band Jolene offers up stream–of–consciousness guitar rock with a melancholy mood. While the meaning of the lyrics is difficult to discern on many songs, the ambient, cavernous feel of the music conveys a sense of loss and depression. The deep, angst–ridden voice of lead singer John Crooke and the contrast between the acoustic and electric guitars create a spooky, spacious sound which sets the tone of the album.

The quintet successfully maintains this murky tone throughout the record, but the lyrics often sound contrived. In "Pensacola," Crooke repeats the chorus, "need you now" in a whiny voice, ruining an otherwise thoughtful, catchy tune. More importantly, the whole thing sounds like it's been done before, and a sameness pervades the record. Jolene is reminiscent of the Counting Crows, minus the energy and variety.

Taken individually, most of the tracks are emotionally moving and sad. "Pensacola" is an eerie love song and "Ouisch" is a pulsing standout. However, as a whole, the album drags on. Jolene's "In The Gloaming" raises a lot of questions but answers few, most importantly, what the hell does "gloaming" mean? C– (Brendan Lynch)

AGAINST ALL ODDS
Shutdown
Victory

THE SERAPHIM FALL
Bloodlet
Victory

It's almost hilarious that both Bloodlet and Shutdown get thrown into the same genre known as hardcore. These bands sound nothing alike and 10 years ago it would be sacrilegious to consider them on the same label. I wonder what Ian McKay would say about Bloodlet being called hardcore.

Shutdown seem to have the whole hardcore thing down pat. They play fast music with enough breakdowns and sing–a–longs to keep things interesting. This is a bunch of straight–edge, high school kids from Queens, N.Y. who are playing their collective hearts out. Hardcore the way the gods intended it to be played, fast and aggressive.

"What's To Come" sets this album off, and you immediately know what's up with Shutdown. Memories of bands like Youth of Today, Token Entry and Gorilla Biscuits all quickly come to mind. While the press kit says this is a combination of old and new school, it sounds like all old school to me.

The themes on this album are about unity and believing in yourself, and while some may consider those topics played out, they never sounded better to these ears. Songs like "Inside Out" and "Hope" sum up the above ideals perfectly. They also reinforce the idea of believing in yourself and achieving your dreams rather then conforming to the constraints of everyday society. The final track, "We Won't Forget," features guest vocals by Craig Setari, and is in memory of Rayboez. The song is a fitting eulogy to a great man, and exemplifies the unity that this band sings about.

The only negative on this album is, surprisingly, the production. Jimmy G, a great man too, does a surprisingly poor job on the boards here. The guitars are too low and the drums and vocals are too loud. However, other then the shoddy production, this is a great album.

The key to listening to the new Bloodlet album, The Seraphim Fall, is remembering that this is a metal album. In fact, they actually succeed because they have devoted themselves to playing metal.

This is pure mind–numbing, shout at the devil metal, full of scary vocals and imagery. While Bloodlet is not as devastating as bands like Today Is The Day or Kiss It Goodbye, this is a fairly punishing album. When Bloodlet keeps things interesting, this is a good listen. However, when they resort to the played out chugga–chugga variety of metal the only reason it's numbing is because it's so boring.

ARE YOU THERE, MARGARET? IT'S ME, GOD
Anthony Westcott

Are You There, Margaret? It's Me, God, the latest offering from UMass student Anthony Westcott, is a collection of funny, irreverent and at times, sick songs along with a few surprisingly serious ones.

Westcott, a member of both the comedy troupe Mission: IMPROVable and the local band Humbert, delivers witty reflections on utterly random minutia without being boring. "Rainy Day Grocery Shopping" is the funniest, most in– depth examination of supermarket happenings you'll probably ever hear, and "Record Store Grrrl" deals with the singer's unrequited love for his favorite mall employee.

The acoustic album also calls attention to any number of mental problems from which Westcott may suffer. Many selections, such as "I Like 'Em Dead" and "Lactatin' Mama" are amusing in that disturbing kind of way. "I Like 'Em Dead" contains the lyric, "You stab 'em, I'll grab 'em… You impale 'em, I'll nail 'em." The songs that start each side of the tape — "Hell of A Guy," and "Total Bastard" — are witty portraits of a hell of a guy and a total bastard. In the latter, the bastard brags that he met a group of Girl Scouts and "taught them every dirty word and how to smoke." At times, the songs seem as though they're gross for the express purpose of being gross, but for the most part there is an even balance of sickness and wit.

A few songs stand out because they're not funny on purpose. "How To Swim," "You're Mouth," and "Another Person" are thoughtful ballads and "Beautiful Lesbian" is both insightful and weirdly funny. Otherwise, Westcott's twisted sense of humor dominates the album, and it ain't deep, but dammit, it's funny. B+ (B.L.)

to be avoiding material from their early work, including their first LP, 1992's Doppelganger. Their set consisted mostly of 1993's Cuckoo, their numerous EPs and the recently released Come Clean. "Missing Link" from Cuckoo was one of the early highlights, as was the first single from Come Clean, "Chinese Burn." "Something Familiar" and "Dog Bone" each struck a nerve with the crowd and translated well in the live setting.

Form watching Curve for even a few minutes, it is obvious that Garbage's Shirley Manson owes a tremendous debt to Halliday. Her onstage exuberance bears an eerie resemblance and easily tops that of the younger Manson. Whether it be jumping up and down or enticing the audience with her sultry appeal, Halliday was clearly the star of the show. Taking center stage, Halliday made certain that all eyes were on her.

Curve finished up their set with "Sweetback" — one of the best tracks from Come Clean and returned to the stage to play a short encore, which included their newest single "Coming Up Roses."

On the whole, however, the show did not go off without a hitch. Buzzing coming form the stage right amplifier had to be fixed, and sporadic feedback came and went until halfway through the set.

As Come Clean is the first LP from Curve in five years, band members Halliday and Garcia brought the Collegian up–to–date on what they have been doing for the past few years.

"Loads of things," said Halliday. "We've been working on and off, different kinds of music and side projects. I got married and Dean spent more time with his children."

After all the time away from the spotlight, touring is "exciting" according to Garcia. "Scary and exciting," added Halliday. Although Curve's largest fan base is in their native England, Halliday and Garcia see little difference in performing to audiences in the U.S. "If people like your stuff, they'll come to your shows," said Halliday. As Garcia put it, "people are the same the world over."

Curve's confidence is boosted by the success of British bands overseas. "It's great to see a British band sell records after a long period of time when British musicians weren't proud of what they were doing," exclaimed Halliday.

Even though Curve considers themselves to be more of a studio band than a live band, they are confident with their live performances. "It's not as intense, but people expect that. It's also a great rush when you perform live a song written in the studio," agreed both Halliday and Garcia. As for recreating their intricate sounds live, Garcia says, "we surprise ourselves."

Padres win, 10–2

CINCINNATI (AP) — The Cincinnati Reds hadn't started a season this poorly in 36 years. And no shortstop has ever started a season worse than Pokey Reese.

Reese tied a opening-day record for shortstops with four errors, helping the San Diego Padres and newcomer Kevin Brown roll to a 10-2 victory yesterday.

Brown, one of a dozen players discarded by the Florida Marlins after their World Series title, gave up one run and five hits in 6 1/3 innings and hit a three-run double in the seventh.

Wally Joyner and Tony Gwynn added homers as baseball's first professional team took its most lopsided opening-day defeat since a 12-4 loss to Philadelphia in 1962.

Brown has won eight straight regular-season decisions since last July 27, the best streak of his career, although he was beaten twice by the Cleveland Indians in the World Series.

Reese put the Padres ahead to stay by committing four errors in the first three innings, tying the record for gaffes a shortstop in a season opener set by the Chicago Cubs' Lou Stringer in his major league debut on April 15, 1941.

Reese, filling in while Barry Larkin recovers from neck surgery, committed the four errors on his first three chances of the season. Two of the errors came on one play.

The capacity crowd of 54,578 booed each misplay and had little to celebrate on an opening day that had already lost a lot of its luster. The Reds traded Dave Burba, their scheduled starter, to the Indians for a minor leaguer less than 24 hours before the first pitch.

Mike Remlinger, the team's No. 1 starter by default, consistently fell behind in the count and gave up three runs in five Innings. He also let in a run with a wild pitch.

Joyner hit a solo homer in sixth off David Weathers, and Gwynn added a two-run homer in the seventh off Ricardo Jordan, the eight-time batting champion's first hit of the season. Brown's bases-loaded double completed a six-run seventh inning that made it 10-0.

Reese's flubs set the tone. He threw into the Reds' dugout while trying to complete a double play for an error in the first, but the Reds got out of it without allowing a run.

He committed three in rapid succession in the third, setting up three runs. Remlinger let in the final run with a wild pitch.

Notes: Brown is 5-0 in six career starts against the Reds, his best record against any team. Brown is 4-0 against the Cubs and Giants... Gwynn went 0-for-3 against Remlinger. He's only 176 career against the left-hander (3-for-17)... Reds owner Marge Schott took her St. Bernard, Schottzie 02, onto the field while the Padres were stretching before the game and asked a couple of them if they wanted to have the dog lick their faces. They declined... The Chicago Cubs' Lou Stringer also made four opening-day errors, in his major league debut on April 15, 1941. The major-league record for errors by a shortstop is five in one game.

Red Sox open up against A's, Henderson

OAKLAND, Calif. (AP) — Rickey Henderson drew a walk, then quickly stole second. A fan at the Oakland Coliseum turned to his buddy and yelled, "Rickey's back! Rickey's back!"

Then, rookie catcher A.J. Hinch burned for a base hit and rookie right fielder Ben Grieve singled to drive in Henderson — who at 39 is nearly as old as Hinch and Grieve combined.

Within three batters, the Oakland Athletics had demonstrated the mixture of experience and youth they hope will lead to success this season, one year after they slumped to the worst record in the major leagues.

Alas, it was only an exhibition game against the San Francisco Giants, and the A's were not facing a pitcher nearly as talented as Pedro Martinez — who will start for the Red Sox when Oakland is host to Boston in today's season opener.

But, after a second straight season of downsizing and trading away players such as Mark McGwire in order to slash the payroll, the A's feel they're ready to start building again with players such as Hinch and Grieve and Henderson, back for his fourth stint in Oakland.

Henderson, the career leader in steals and leadoff homers, grew up in Oakland and was a member of the Athletics' 1989 World Series championship team. He was greeted as a returning hero when the A's were host to the Giants last Sunday.

While fans waved signs proclaiming "Welcome Home, Rickey," Henderson helped manufacture that run in the first inning and then doubled in two runs in the fourth.

"He set the tone, didn't he?" marveled A's manager Art Howe, who is beginning his third season. "It's like it's written in the script."

The A's and Red Sox are trying to rebound from miserable seasons. While the A's went 65-97, the Red Sox were 78-84 to place fourth in the AL East. Both will be starting pitchers today who were in the National League last year.

Martinez won the NL Cy Young Award last season for Montreal with a 17-8 record, a 1.90 ERA and 305 strikeouts. He got a $75 million, six-year contract from the Red Sox, plus the opening day start.

"It's going to be a little bit different for me," Martinez said. "The baseball fields don't change at all — you have the walls, the lines and three bases and home plate to throw the ball around. But the hitters. I'll have to go to school."

Howe has seen Martinez pitch when both were in the NL, and managed him in winter baseball in the Caribbean.

"I know what Martinez looks like. He's got pretty good stuff," Howe said. "But we've got a pretty good lineup, too."

The A's, who had the worst pitching staff in the majors last season with an ERA of 5.48, will counter with knuckleballer Tom Candiotti — who signed with Oakland as a free agent from the Los Angeles Dodgers.

Though he also moved in the offseason, Boston reliever Dennis Eckersley will be coming back to the ballpark at which he spent many years with the A's.

Eckersley, who was with the St. Louis Cardinals last season, said he's looking forward to returning — though he knows the Coliseum, and the crowds, are much different than in the A's championship years.

The Athletics have ranked near the bottom in the major leagues in attendance the last two years, and the Coliseum was renovated two years ago to lure the NFL's Raiders back to Oakland.

"There are a lot of memories. Different ballpark, though," Eckersley said. "It'll be nice the first night, they'll

Mets open up winners

NEW YORK (AP) — By the time the Phillies and Mets finished in the 14th inning, opening day had become opening night.

In the longest scoreless opener in National League history, pinch-hitter Alberto Castillo's single with two outs and the bases loaded yesterday gave New York a 1-0 victory over Philadelphia.

The Mets want their fans to "Believe" again, and after one game, they do. A nearly full Shea Stadium was bathed in sunshine and 82-degree temperatures when the first pitch was thrown at 1:45 p.m. EDT. Although there were far less than the 49,142 left at 6:20 p.m. when Brian McRae crossed home plate, Mets fans had their faith rewarded.

Matt Franco opened the 14th with a single off Ricky Bottalico (0-1) and became just the third Met to reach second base when McRae walked. After a forceout at third, Bernard Gilkey singled for what should have been the game-winning hit to left, but McRae lost his footing and fell rounding third.

The Mets dugout, which had spilled onto the field to celebrate Gilkey's hit, retreated and waited. Luis Lopez popped up for the second out, and it looked like the marathon would continue when Castillo finally ended it with a single to right on a full-count pitch.

Turk Wendell (1-0), the Mets' sixth pitcher, picked up the win with two innings of hitless relief.

If this had been a spring training game, the game would have been stopped by mutual agreement. But when it went to the 14th tied 0-0, it surpassed the previous longest opener in NL history set by Brooklyn and New York in 1906 and again in 1909.

The longest opening day game in major league history came in 1926 when Washington beat Philadelphia in 15.

New York's bullpen, a disaster a year ago, displayed its new depth and quality by holding the Phillies to five hits in the final eight innings. And catchers Tim Spehr and Castillo, who'll fill a spot in the line-up until Todd Hundley returns, combined for three of New York's seven hits.

Phillies starter Curt Schilling pitched eight shutout innings on opening day for the second straight year and was matched by New York's Bobby Jones, who allowed four hits in six shutout innings. Schilling stopped using smokeless tobacco last month after a lesion was removed from his mouth, and is now pitching while wearing a nicotine patch. The right-hander, who set an NL record for right-handers with 319 strikeouts last season, walked one and struck out nine.

New York shortstop Rey Ordonez made his first highlight-reel play of the year in the seventh. He charged and barehanded a slow roller and made a diving off-balance throw to nip Mark Lewis at first.

Orioles fall to Belcher, Royals

BALTIMORE (AP) — The weather was unusually fine, and so was Tim Belcher.

Belcher, starting in place of the injured Kevin Appier, allowed three hits in seven scoreless innings yesterday as the Kansas City Royals opened the season by beating Mike Mussina and the Baltimore Orioles, 4-1.

Rookie Larry Sutton drove in three runs and Jeff King went 2-for-2 and scored twice before leaving in the fourth inning with a sore back. It was the fifth straight time the Royals opened the season against Baltimore — and only the second time they won. Baltimore lost despite 11 strikeouts in eight innings by Mussina, and the defeat ruined the debut of Orioles' manager Ray Miller, whose star-studded team is expected to make a third straight run at the playoffs. On this day, however, Baltimore's potent batting order was quiet against a 36-year-old pitcher who went 13-12 last year with a 5.02 ERA.

After Belcher left, consecutive doubles by Joe Carter and Chris Hoiles against Jose Rosado got Baltimore to 3-1 in the eighth. Scott Service then struck out pinch-hitter Harold Baines and Jeff Montgomery worked the ninth for the save.

The previous two openers at Camden Yards were postponed because of bad weather, but the game-time temperature was a summer-like 91 degrees. Belcher, putting a chill on the crowd of 46,820, allowed only three runners and struck out six en route to the win. Appier, who had started every opener for Kansas City since 1991, was scratched this year after shoulder surgery. Belcher proved to be a suitable replacement — he faced only one over the minimum and did not permit a runner past first.

His success was reminiscent of last year's game, in which Baltimore's Jimmy Key started in place of an ailing Mussina and pitched six strong innings in a 4-2 win. Mussina pitched well enough this time around, but experienced the same problem he encountered in last year's AL championship series — no offensive support.

Mussina gave up three runs and walked none in falling to 9-3 against Kansas City.

Kentucky overcomes odds to win championship

SAN ANTONIO (AP) — A new coach. No superstar. Another title.

"Some people overlooked us this season," Kentucky guard Wayne Turner said. "I think when you look at this team, it was an attitude of us against the world."

These are the Comeback 'Cats, the NCAA champions. They came back against Duke, Stanford and then Utah, winning 78-69 Monday night for their second national title in three years.

"It's amazing what you can accomplish when you don't care who gets the credit," coach Tubby Smith said.

The Wildcats rallied from 10 points down at the half, the largest comeback in the history of title games. But the comeback, in essence, started after last year's team lost to Arizona in the championship game.

All-American forward Ron Mercer turned pro and coach Rick Pitino no longer could withstand the lure of an NBA return. Athletic director C.M. Newton wasted no time in hiring Georgia's Tubby Smith, the first black to coach the storied program.

Inheriting a team devoid of superstars, Smith built a unit forged on the principles of hard work and unselfishness.

"We believed from day one that we could win it," Smith said. "That never changed. Every team that throws the ball up on the first day of practice back in October believes they can do it. If you don't believe it will happen, then it never occurs."

Kentucky (35-4) hit rough spots early on, with rare home losses to Louisville, Florida and Mississippi. Those defeats did not sit well with fans.

"We had some really good times and some really bad times on and off the court," senior guard Jeff Sheppard said. "Some things happened to this team that we couldn't do anything about. And there is something about going through those times that make you pull together as a team and as coaches and teammates pull together as one team."

Twelve games into the season — and two losses — Smith inserted Nazr Mohammed into the starting lineup in place of Jamaal Magloire at center to add more offensive punch. Mohammed went on to make All-Southeastern Conference while Magloire was a reliable backup. When forward Allen Edwards slumped midway through the season, Smith stuck with him and used Heshimu Evans off the bench. Edwards finally regained his touch during the postseason while Evans continued to light a spark at a reserve.

Different players stepped up all season. The balance was reflected in six players averaging between 13.7 points (Sheppard) and 8.8 (Evans).

"Coach Smith always told us that individuals can win games but it takes teams to win championships," said Sheppard, who sat out last season as a redshirt and was voted the Final Four's most valuable player.

Defensively, Smith made adjustments, switching from man-to-man to various zones when teams were knocking down three-pointers. There was no need, however, to adjust the intensity. That was constant.

Horoscopes

ARIES (March 21–April 19) — You may have to put up with more than your share of interruption or intrusion today. Take care you don't let your residerate of another's time today. You don't want others to think that you're taking advantage.

TAURUS (April 20–May 20) — You and a friend or loved one will have a good reason to reaffirm your commitment to one another and join forces to wage war against a double threat.

GEMINI (May 21–June 20) — Time spent contemplating your current situation is well-spent indeed — if you use what you learn to improve things as soon as possible.

CANCER (June 21–July 22) — You are likely to reach the extent of your influence before the day is out, leaving you to trust that others will do the right thing on their own.

LEO (July 23–Aug. 22) — You are advised to be cautious today, particularly where travel and investments are concerned. Avoid an overly aggressive financial strategy.

VIRGO (Aug. 23–Sept. 22) — You will be making contacts left and right today. Right now, though, it's not who you know, but how fast you get to know them. Trust your gut!

LIBRA (Sept. 23–Oct. 22) — It is important that you be just a little more considerate of another's time today. You don't want others to think that you're taking advantage.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23–Nov. 21) — Pitch in and help where you can, and you'll be rewarded for your efforts in good time. Take care that you don't start becoming too demanding.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22–Dec. 21) — A change is in the works that could have you packing up and getting out sooner than expected. Still, it may be just a false alarm.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22–Jan. 19) — You are going to want to share what you know with those who can benefit from it, but timing is the key. Keep things under wraps for now.

AQUARIUS (Jan 20.–Feb. 18) — You will receive some advise today that has you thinking that perhaps you've been on the wrong path. Take care; you're the only one in your shoes!

PISCES (Feb 19–March 20) — You are more in tune with things today than you have been in a long while. Keep your ear to the ground; you'll pick up important messages.

Huskies down Minutemen, 11-3

For Massachusetts freshman pitcher Jason Grechika, yesterday afternoon was not a homecoming to remember.

The Watertown, Conn. native got the ball against his home state school, but lasted only 3–plus innings and took the loss in a 11–3 Connecticut victory.

The Huskies jumped on the southpaw early and often before Rich Hartman entered in the fourth inning. All in all, Grechika gave up seven runs on eight hits in his first collegiate start.

But don't blame Grechika alone for the defeat.

UMass continued to swing the bats well, pounding out 12 hits against their border–rivals. However, the Minutemen stranded 10 runners on base in the contest.

After the Huskies took a 2–0 lead in the first inning, UMass responded with a run in the top of the third to cut the deficit in half. However, UConn scored three in the third and four more in the fourth to distance itself from the Minutemen.

Eight UMass starters had hits in the contest, and senior second baseman Muchie Dagliere went 3–for–5 to extend his hitting streak to 15 games. The North Haven, Conn. product is hitting .606 with 13 RBI over his last seven games, and leads the squad with a .492 average.

Brian Samela and Aaron Braunstein also had two hits apiece in the losing effort.

Five UConn players had two hits apiece and Scott Berney went eight innings to pick up his first win of the year.

UMass falls to 10–6 with the loss, and will now set its sights on its home opener today at 3 p.m., when the Saints of Siena College visit Earl E. Lorden Field.

The Saints enter today's game with a 4–16 mark, a far cry from a 1997 team that won the Metro Atlantic Athletic Conference crown and advanced to an NCAA play–in game.

Gone from that team are four starting pitchers, which is the main reason for the poor mark. The only seasoned pitchers for Siena will be juniors Dave Fields and Kevin Brown.

However, all nine position starters are back for the Saints. Leading the way will be first baseman Mike Ostrander. The junior was the MAAC tourney MVP last year, and led the team in both home runs (5) and RBI (44).

At second base will be captain Dave Marek, a four year starter for coach Tony Rossi. Marek led the Saints in hitting last year and was an All–MAAC first team selection.

Other Siena players to watch for include freshman catcher Bill Cilento and outfielder Tony Fiumefreddo, who hit .306 a year ago.

The Saints are directed by longtime coach Rossi, who has been at the helm of Siena baseball since 1968. Rossi has turned the program around from a once floundering Division II team to a middle class Division I program that has won three consecutive MAAC crowns.

These two teams met last season in Loudonville, N.Y., with UMass coming out at 21–4 winners. Jeff Puleri earned the win in that contest. Overall, the Minutemen hold a 10–5 advantage in the all–time series, which began in 1978.

On the UMass side of things, the offense continues to put up impressive numbers. The Minutemen had scored 76 runs in their previous five games, all wins, before the UConn loss.

Dagliere, Pete Gautreau, Shaun Skeffington, Doug Clark, Brian Samela and reigning A–10 Player of the Week Matt Wolcott have all been hot as of late at the plate. Collectively, the team is hitting at a .345 clip (before yesterday's game) on the year.

And with a depleted Siena pitching staff making its way to Amherst today, the opportunity is on the table to regain the form that UMass displayed over the weekend.

Minutemen Notes: Dagliere has a hit in every contest which he has started this year. He has 25 RBI already this year, after only driving in 36 a year ago… Hartman came in relief of Grechika and tied a career high with four strikeouts in five innings of work… yesterday was also a homecoming of sorts for Scott Barnsby, Nick Skirkanich, Chris Wandelt, Samela and Dagliere, as all are Connecticut natives…

UMass senior second baseman Muchie Dagliere has been out on the basepaths a lot this season, as he carries a 15– game hit streak into today's contest with Siena.

UMass looks to get back on track vs. Brown

By Jamie Jee
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts women's lacrosse team will look to rebound from two tough losses to nationally ranked opponents when it hosts Brown University today at 4 p.m. on Totman Field.

UMass (2–2) will meet the Bears (1–3, 0–1 Ivy League) in hopes of getting back on the winning track. The Minutewomen have played well throughout the season, but in their two last contests against Yale and Temple, were pitted against deep and consistently strong teams.

UMass is looking to move on now, however, and have chalked those games up as valuable learning experiences. In fact, the Minutewomen did improve compared to last year's showing against Temple, scoring six goals, more than any previous UMass team and the second most against the Owls this year.

"In the Temple game, we really learned how to play the runner's game and how to pick up the quicker players," Massachusetts coach Francenca McClellan said. "It was good training for us. Against Yale, we became a little smarter defending funky plays and a little stronger one–on–one."

In today's matchup, the Minutewomen will hope to also improve against a Brown team that defeated them, 16–5, in the season finale last year and holds the all–time series advantage at 6–3. UMass will be looking for a win though, and not just a decreased goal deficit.

"We're actually very excited to be playing [Brown]," McClellan said. "They recently lost to Harvard by a goal, so I think it should be a really good matchup."

The Minutewomen beat the Crimson in their season opener with a 13–12 double overtime win.

The question this afternoon may center around who decides to penetrate and simply throw it in the net, as UMass has received several different multiple–goal performances thus far. In the team's win over Harvard, it was freshman attacker Fay Naber who came through, scoring four goals. Against Holy Cross, it was senior attacker Jen Bowen who tossed in three scores in the win. Finally, in the loss to Yale, current leading scorer Laura Koruzt netted four tallies.

"What's nice about our offense is that anyone can contribute at anytime," McClellan said. "We can do a little bit of everything, which affects the outcome of different matchups."

Minutewomen scoring leaders Koruzt and Naber will look to counter any possible damage from their Bear counterparts in the senior midfielder tandem of Phoebe Koch and Allison Schettini, who have combined for 15 points on the season. Koch, who happens to be the niece of UMass men's soccer coach Sam Koch, and Schettini, have often times also combined with junior Amanda Hatton to form a formidable scoring triad. The defense and the freshman goaltending combination of Jen Nardi and Tara Durkin will have to work together to prevent them from scoring at will.

"I feel that we can match up with Brown's key kids well," McClellan said. "Strategically, our first four games have prepared us well. Drop sessions have been very important so far and will be today as well. I just hope we can put it together."

UM opens in Georgia

Massachusetts women's track and field coach Julie LaFreniere and her squad team have great expectations for their outdoor season.

The indoor track and field team ended on an emotional victory, and made a loud statement, by winning the Atlantic 10 Championship. This UMass indoor team let its competition know that you can't take the conference championship lightly.

The team proved to its biggest competitor, Virginia Tech (which was favored to win the A–10s), that being focused and having emotion can make or break a meet. In this case, the fired–up Minutewomen showed the Hokies what they knew they could do. Many school records were broken, and the UMass team walked out on top.

With the energy and excitement the indoor team ended on, the outdoor contingent is ready to pick up where it left off. Add the return of captains Rosey Bryan, Anya Forrest, Rebecca Donaghue and Shana Mitchell into the mix, and the team is expected to be strong.

"Last year was a struggle at times because of several injuries, but we are stronger this season," LaFreniere said. "I depend on my captains to keep an eye on things. They are leaders by example, sensitive to issues with the team, mature, and have a good relationship with their teammates."

The women's team faces a tough schedule, as they will open their season in Georgia in a meet against Alabama, Auburn, Kentucky and Western Carolina.

But the tough schedule doesn't phase the Minutewomen.

"Top competition makes you a better competitor," LaFreniere said.

While this weekend's meet will be the opening for many of the girls on the track and field team, two girls on the team will have already participated in their first meet.

Andrea Comeau and Melissa Ward competed in a heptathlon in Gainesville, Fla. last weekend.

A heptathlon consists of seven events: the high jump, the 100m high hurdles, the shot put, the 200m dash, the javelin, the 800m and the long jump. Four events run on one day and three run the following day.

The women's track and field team have a short outdoor season. Their season begins in early April and ends in early June.

However, there is a problem looming on the horizon for the Minutewomen seniors. Because the ECAC Championships are May 22–24, these athletes will have to decide if they want to participate in the ECAC Championships or graduate with their fellow classmates on May 24.

LaFreniere is looking forward to the outdoor season, especially with the boost of finishing the indoor season with a huge upset over Virginia Tech. As a group, the UMass women's track and field team will take on the 1998 outdoor season with the attitude "nothing is impossible."

Jen Bowen and the Massachusetts women's lacrosse team will look for their third win of the year today in a 3 p.m. faceoff with Brown at Totman Field.

Women's soccer hits the jackpot with top recruits

By Jorma Kansanen
Collegian Staff

As winter begins to melt away around the Pioneer Valley, green pastures are not just indicative of the farmland surrounding this University. With the addition of three top flight scholarship recruits for the Massachusetts women's soccer program, the future looks bright for the defending Atlantic 10 champions.

Add a transfer from the University of San Francisco to the mix, and coach Jim Rudy has a foursome that will be able to fill the holes left behind by a stellar senior class.

Martha Conover (Liverpool, N.Y.), Sarah Cook (Cincinnati, Ohio) and Cori Stevens (Greensboro, N.C.) will make up the incoming freshman class, and Suzannah Nord (Oakland, Ca.), a two–year starter at defense for USF, will come in as a junior next fall.

For the past few seasons, Rudy has wanted to recruit these kind of quality student–athletes to push his team back into the perennial Top 10 — instead of the perennial Top 25 — and he has received what he wished for.

"We're very pleased with these players, and they have the potential to be the best ever at UMass," Rudy said. "We wanted to emphasize speed and personality with this class, and we got that."

Defense is a necessity for the Minutewomen, as the team will graduate three–quarters of its backfield this spring. With the loss of the senior tri–captaincy, defenders Erica Iverson and Liz Rutherford and goalkeeper Danielle Dion, plus defender Amy Burrill, junior Amanda Thompson will be the only returnee.

UMass injects instant experience to the backline with the addition of Nord, who was a member of the prestigious Northern California Olympic Development Program team in 1995. At Berkeley High School, she played to all fields, and was the offensive MVP in 1994, and the defensive MVP in 1995.

Nord's transfer to UMass has been a long time coming, and will also be a sort of homecoming. She was born in Brooklyn, N.Y., and lived there until she was three, so her return to the East Coast will not only be a sporting one for her, but a historical one as well.

"I've wanted to go to UMass since my freshman year in high school, but it was kind of weird, because in my senior year I changed my mind and went to San Francisco," Nord said. "I didn't apply anywhere else, and that was a mistake. I stuck it out until my sophomore year, and that's when I decided to transfer.

"I think I'll fully realize my potential under Coach Rudy. In college, you need the best coaching to get the best out of yourself."

With the loss of Dion in net, another goalkeeper was needed in conjunction with sophomore Angie Napoli. Napoli has proven her worth over her first two seasons in a backup role, and with the addition of Stevens, who was the Conference and Regional Goalkeeper of the Year for both 1996 and 1997 in the North Carolina area, the Minutewomen have a nice one–two punch in net.

Stevens brings an impressive résumé to UMass, which includes her All–State selection for Grimsley High in 1996–'97 (stats: 41 games, 40 starts, 33 shutouts with only 11 goals allowed) and she also was a N.C. ODP team member from 1991–97. Her choices came down to Pennsylvania, N.C. State and UMass. The Minutewomen won in the end.

"UMass is just a great area, and I like it because it's a college town," Stevens said. "I wanted to get out of North Carolina, and find a new place and explore. When it came to N.C. State, it was like 'been there, done that.'

"I know the game of soccer pretty well, and I'll do whatever it takes to win. My game is not the prettiest, but I try to make up for that with my natural athletic ability. I'm looking forward to coming in and playing well next year."

Another possible defender for UMass next season will be Conover, who has played in both the midfield and defense for Liverpool High and her club team, the Salt City Shakers. Conover was a first team All–N.Y. State selection in 1996 and 1997, and the Central N.Y. high school Player of the Year in 1997 as well.

"Two things helped me make my decision to come to UMass," Conover said, who chose to come to Amherst over Princeton. "One, it was the coach of the team, and two, the team really made me feel like a part of the family.

"My strengths are that I'm determined, and I work hard out on the field. I have a good vision of the game, but I just need to learn the intricacies of the game. Next year is going to be an interesting year for all us freshmen, and I'm sure it's going to be very competitive."

This entire incoming class of players is impressive, but the player that might stand a little bit above the rest is Cook. The Sycamore High School and Club Ohio midfield standout brings a history of leadership to UMass, being named the best offensive player at Sycamore for three seasons (1994–96), and was the team captain for Club Ohio from 1995–97.

According to Cook's club coach, Louis Hollmeyer, the first team All–Cincinnati selection will bring a heightened sense of speed and agility to UMass. Hollmeyer has a high opinion of Cook, and compares her to another Cincinnati player, Danielle Borgman, who is the star recruit for the defending NCAA champion in North Carolina.

"Sarah is just explosive," said Hollmeyer, who was a member of the men's soccer team at UMass (1990). "When coaches come to our matches, it only takes five minutes for Sarah to jump out to them. Her skills have gelled over the last two years, and she's a lot more adept with the ball, and it's tighter when she has possession.

"But truthfully, she hasn't even come close to reaching her potential yet, and a lot players reach that in their senior year of high school."

Cook is prepared to make an instant impact for the Minutewomen, and she wants to bring her history of success at the high school and club level to UMass.

"What made me decide to come to UMass was the people I met there," Cook said. "Rudy was real down to earth, and my teammates were easy to talk to, and getting along with the team was the top priority in my decision.

"On the field, I will have to work on my decision making, especially at the collegiate level. Establishing a spot right away next season is important to me, and I want people to recognize me out on the field right from the start."

Massachusetts women's soccer coach Jim Rudy (left) has brought in a solid recruiting class for the 1998 season.

Stars speak candidly of careers with Collegian

By Bryan McAllister & Corey Feldman
Collegian Staff and Star of Bordello of Blood

BOISE, Idaho — Chaotic hysteria surrounded Hollywood like a Police Academy festival Thursday, March 26 when a collection of the most powerful and humble people in the entertainment industry gathered together in an Idaho school cafeteria to discuss upcoming projects, their sex lives and just how cool they really are.

First names only were necessary: assembled were Leonardo, James, Kate, Matt, Ben, Jack, Madonna and Leonardo's Friend With the Really Bad Italian Accent In Titanic. A hush filled the cafeteria when the eight entered, and just for good measure, Ashley Judd strolled in, covered head–to–toe in a multi–layered Saudi Arabian tunic. Some who attended swore that her ankles were showing.

Incredibly, the Daily Collegian was the only Media Thingy to be invited to this unprecedented, historic event. Also in attendance were a bunch of really old school lunch ladies and a kid named Dickey.

After Idaho elementary school principal Joseph Cotton cleared off the milk cartons and dirty napkins from the table, the Hollywood superstars took their seats. It was noted by several observers that Leonardo asked for a high–chair and a bib.

I began the interview by ignoring the young, hot stars and focusing on ugly, bird–like James Cameron.

ME: James, how does it feel to have won an Oscar?

JAMES: Oh, it's not really about the money. And it's not about fame or prestige. Frankly, I just enjoy the art. It's ridiculous how much attention the movie is getting. Titanic was really just a subtle metaphor, and people really shouldn't forget the tragedy of it. In fact, I'm planning to have every elementary school in America observe a moment of silence each morning in memory of those lost.

MADONNA: I disapproved of all the sex you showed in Titanic. That stuff is just wrong.

ME: James, I heard your next project is actually a study of mating tendencies in modern cultures.

JAMES: Yes, that's right, it's a remake of Planet of the Apes.

MATT & BEN: I think we should talk more about us.

ME: Matt Damon and Ben Affleck, the stars of Good Will Hunting, and some of the most arrogant, conceited people in Hollywood. How do you live with yourselves? You guys should really be more modest, like Leonardo and Jack Nicholson.

DICKEY: And me.

ME: And Dickey. Speaking of Leonardo, does the young star enjoy all his new–found fame?

LEONARDO: I'd prefer not to talk about myself.

ME: Are you sure?

LEONARDO: I'm very shy. I'm ugly and I hate myself.

ME: What's your next project?

LEONARDO: Just the "Growing Pains" reunion.

GUY WITH THE REALLY BAD ITALIAN ACCENT IN TITANIC: I once had two lines in an episode of "The Facts of Life."

MADONNA: I was the voice of all the Snorks.

ME: So you all have humble beginnings, then? You all built your way up from nothing, yet still don't have big heads?

NICHOLSON: Not when there are people starving in West Virginia, Bryan.

ME: I'm afraid we're out of time. Any comments on upcoming projects?

DICKEY: I plan to graduate first grade.

MATT: We're planning a movie called Why Everyone Loves Us. I beat up Ben and take over the world.

BEN: Screw you. You know we're not really best friends. That was just a publicity stunt to make people cry for us. And you can now call me The Actor Formerly Known as Ben Affleck.

KATE WINSLET: I love Idaho.

KATE'S AGENT: Kate, shut up, get naked, and look pretty. Stop eating the potatoes. You're getting fat.

DICKEY: We have good squash, too.

Hagen, cleared him of all charges.

Police believe that the bomb in Cheaney's mailbox may have been Calipari's retribution for the incident in 1994 when Cheaney stormed into Calipari's press conference threatening to "kick his ass." Cheaney has since apologized after discovering the device in his mailbox. As a result of his alleged involvement in the incident, Flint has been dubbed by local F.B.I. agent Joe Pistone as the "Uni– Bruiser."

Clarke, who is yet to be revealed as a concrete suspect in the investigation, has been named by Gravano as a possible heir to the local Calipari Family in Amherst. When asked why he decided to attend the University of Massachusetts, Clarke responded, "They made me an offer I couldn't refuse."

Uncoincidentally, Gravano stated that former Calipari assistant Bill "The Angel of Death" Bayno has been strategically placed in Las Vegas — an area notorious for mob ties dating back to the days of casino "Ace" Sam Rothstein.

Although most feel that Calipari "jumped ship" when the proverbial shit hit the fan in the waning hours of the Marcus Camby scandal, investigators now suspect that his move to New Jersey may have had a higher purpose. According to Gravano, Calipari was named a possible replacement for John Gotti as head of the Gambino family. Gotti has allegedly been running the family from prison since his incarceration in 1990.

Calipari has also recently been spotted eating at Spark's Steak House in Manhattan, where former head of the Gambino Family Paul Costellano was brutally gunned down in 1985 by both Gotti and Gravano.

Upon learning of the allegations, University of Massachusetts athletic director Bob Marcum defended his former coaches, Bayno and Calipari, current coach Flint, and current athlete Clarke.

"Fugghetaboudit! John, Bruiner, Bill, and Charlton, to my knowledge, have no affiliation with any organized crime," Marcum said. "I stand by their stories of innocence every step of the way."

UMass Chancellor David K. Scott was unavailable for comment, as he has suffered a relapse of the "Mad Cow Disease" which afflicted him exactly two years ago. Calipari and Flint deny having any connection with the very timely food poisoning of Chancellor Scott, with whom both individuals have had numerous disagreements over his illness. According to El Torbino's story of Scott's original bout with the disease, the UMass Chancellor vowed to "actually eat UMass dining commons beef" if the basketball team was defeated by Kentucky in the 1996 Final Four.

Rumor has it that Calipari became irate as a result of the pressure put on his team to win by Scott and tampered with the meat; however, Franklin Dining Common officials attempted to exonerate Calipari by professing, "It is not our opinion that anyone tampered with the meat. We often serve infected beef."

According to recent CNN rumors, Hyman Roth, a long–time Miami friend of Calipari and Flint, will also come forward testify against Calipari in an attempt to remove himself with any associative charges.

Both Calipari and Bayno are expected to be indicted by Thursday morning. Harvard professor Alan Dershowitz and O.J. Simpson attorney Johnny Cochran have been mention as possible counsel for the accused. The motto of their defense is expected to be "Refuse to Bruise."

With the decision to substitute Rudinho for Ronaldo, Chamidingo was immediately fired as the Brazilian national team coach after the match. However, the boisterously beleaguered coach has already found a nowhere job in a nowhere soccer league — the NAIA.

"Forget about international football, I'm going to coach in the States, where the real money's at, man," Chamidingo said. "I heard there's a real future in coaching college soccer. Yeah, really… I'm not kidding!"

After Rudinho's controversial goal last spring against the FIFA World All Stars, where he knocked AC Milan's George Weah out with a vicious clout from a six–inch fish hook stuck in his skull (don't ask), Rudinho was indefinitely suspended from international play. A year full of hearings and trials, multinational payoffs and bribes that would make Ronald Reagan and Oliver North blush ended with FIFA granting Rudinho one more shot.

Unbeknownst to the international football… I mean…soccer governing body, Rudy made his last shot into a "shot" — and once again, it was to an opponent's skull. Thus, this brilliant move by one of the most overhyped athletes in the history of the sport (well, maybe behind Paul Gascoigne or Alexi Lalas) forced FIFA to revoke his playing privileges for life.

No lie, babe. Rudinho can't even play for a local club team like "The Old Boys," or even in his backyard, without having some FIFA thug rub him out for good.

For Lalas and Gascoigne, who's the man, now?

"I'm still stewing over his Howdy Doody crack a few years back," Lalas said. "That comment made me suck to bad for the New England Revolution that I had to be traded to a team that is more schizo than me — the New York/New Jersey Metro Stars."

"He's a bloody fkin' wanker," Gascoigne said, while sitting on the bench eating a bag of Walker's Crisps for the Glascow Rangers of the Scottish Premier League. "He's a worse nobody than me now, and oh yeah, he still owes me from that allnighter we had in London five years ago.

"I would get it from him myself, but I can't be bothered."

Bible: a hot new release

THE BIBLE
Unknown
Supreme Publishers

Knocking John Grisham off the New York Times Bestseller Lists would require a feat of divine intervention, but Grisham has finally met his match.

Taking cue from Anonymous (Primary Colors), a brilliant new writer, Unknown, has burst onto the scene with a tome of the most fantastical proportions. In its first week in bookstores, the Bible has been flying off the shelves and bookstores are finding it difficult to keep up with the demand.

"I don't know who this Unknown person is," says local bookseller, Moses Solomon. "But whoever Unknown is, he's really hit the jackpot on this one. This book has got everything: villains, heroes, great leaders, sex, betrayal. You name it, this book has it."

Starting off with the gripping premise of "In the beginning there was nothing," the Bible takes the reader on a journey which ultimately results in a spiritual realization of magnitude previously unknown in the world of literature.

Simple but elegant prose set the tone for the Bible; especially of note is the skillful wording of "Let there be light." The sheer majesty of those four words exemplify the power of Unknown's writing.

Unknown's portrayal of the key characters is alternately sympathetic or vicious. For example, both Adam and Eve are shown as the originators of the first sin in a way that is touching and human. On the other hand, Cain comes across as a mercenary, willing to murder even his own brother. But the bad guys get all the good lines in this page–turner and Cain gets a doozy of one: "Am I my brother's keeper?"

Probably the climax of the Bible comes with the Hebrews exodus out of Egypt. Unknown relates the 40 years of trekking through the desert in a gripping fashion, culminating with the parting of the Red Sea.

The Bible is a must have for anyone interested in having a beautiful leather–bound, gold–leafed book for their library. However, the books are flying off the shelves and you should head over to your nearest Barnes and Noble for a copy. But if you run out of luck, the Gideons have been kind enough to leave a copy in hotel rooms across the country. Also, check your local dining halls for people distributing complimentary copies of the book. But wherever you do get your copy, keep in mind this dramatic foray into literature will prove to be a true classic in every sense of the word. A+

Middle East officials tee off on policy in diplomatic golf match

By Tennis Ball Bouncer & Arts Girl
Collegian Lackeys

In an unprecedented event, sports and politics have combined to bring new meaning in the struggle towards world peace.

In the past, Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and Palestinian Authority Chairman Yassar Arafat have faced difficult times in the stalled peace process, but they displayed solidarity by honoring the memory of England's Princess Diana and her efforts to ban landmines.

Yesterday evening, Netanyahu and Arafat met on a proposed golf course, strewn with landmines, in order to bring attention to the landmine effort.

"The most important thing to a person is freedom, and land mines restrict freedom in the most basic way," Arafat said. "Mostly land mines take away life itself, which is the most basic of freedoms. It is reprehensible. We cannot allow this to continue."

Netanyahu echoed Arafat's sentiments saying, "The people of Israel were deeply wounded when Diana was killed. It is not only symbolic as Israeli and Palestinian leader are unified in promoting a cause so dear to the Princess but it's also important that cause is directed against dangerous weapons."

The U.S. Envoy Dennis Ross was given the difficult task of arranging the meeting between Netanyahu and Arafat. Finally, Ross hit upon the idea of honoring Princess Diana in a sporting way as a way to move on the stalled Middle East peace process. The final golfing result will undoubtedly go down as the greatest achievement since the Oslo Accords.

"We've asked guerrillas and Israeli troops to cease fighting in Southern Lebanon for the day. We have every reason to believe they will comply. Of course, there might some issues, but we hope everyone works together to make this event successful. It would be a tragedy if we were not able to join together on this significant event," Ross said.

Ross also said that plans are underway to clear the minefields.

"We plan to use our most experienced United Nations people to clear the minefields," Ross said in a press conference yesterday. "There are plans in progress to construct a golf course of the highest quality. At the opening of the course, Netanyahu and Arafat will play 18 holes, simultaneously celebrating the life of Diana and making a symbolic gesture for peace."

"This will be great for our two peoples, but I won't be satisfied unless I beat him by at least three holes," the Israeli prime minister said. "We pulled our top guys off missile building duties to work on a really kick ass driver."

Arafat, more known for his terrorist activities than for his golf game, is optimistic about the match–up.

"I have never played the game before, but I've watched Tiger Woods a bunch of times. My only hope is that the United Nations somehow forgets to remove a mine off the fifteenth hole," Arafat said.

In a side note, the golf match has dwarfed the betting frenzy surrounding last weekend's Final Four. Over $20 billion are being wagered on the match according to Las Vegas odds makers.

"We know desert golf. It's grueling and when minefields are involved, all bets are off," an anonymous bookie said.

The match has not gone without controversy. Netanyahu has insisted he will walk the course, but there is speculation Arafat lacks the endurance to walk 18 holes on a minefield.

"Arafat has got to be 70 years old. He's led a resistance movement for more than half a century. For peace's sake, give him a break and let him ride," said embattled golfer, Casey Martin.

UMass softball star faces juices up, NKOTB to sing opening anthem

In news that is certain to push Titanic to the back of entertainment sections nation-wide, what promises to be one of the greatest cultural events of our generation will occur at Totman Field on Saturday.

The original members of the New Kids on the Block will reunite to sing the national anthem at the UMass softball home opener. The boys from Dorchester had wanted their reunion to come at their state U's spring concert but UPC couldn't pony up their $1.99 asking fee.

"For years now we've been telling people 'come on everybody if you want to take a chance just get on the floor and do the New Kids dance.'" Joe McIntyre said through his agent Hehath Nothin. "The time's right now and I guess this Bert chick really digs us too."

The NKOTB reunion is one of the highlights of a star- studded schedule of singers. Trisha Yearwood, Puff Daddy and Debbie Gibson will also come to Totman, along with the cast of Sesame Street on Ice for a special performance before the North Carolina game.

The news is not all good though. Reportedly petrified by an obsessed fan, Vanilla Ice cancelled his scheduled date along with a show at a junior high school dance in Tonawanda, N.Y. The Spice Girls appearance for UConn was nearly cancelled when Sporty Spice had complications from a nose job but she will be replaced by Kelly Buckley.

• Diminutive 5-foot-2 outfielder Katie Kenderski has been suspended following a positive drug test for steroids. Trainer Matt DiBartaolomeo first became alarmed when the petite number nine-hitter recently topped the scales at 82 pounds. She was also seen shopping for a full size-two dress, instead of her usual size-1/8.

Recent reports indicate that Kenderski will soon eclipse the 100-pound plateau. The usually harmless owner of a 3.97 cumulative GPA (for real) was described as a volatile monster by her teammates.

"I am scared shitless and getting the hell out of Dodge," said Becky George who returned to her rural Pennsylvania roots as fast as she could go in her little red rodeo. Trying out for Swingers 2 she just screamed "Schnecksville, baby, Schneckville."

Kenderski was at home for a team dinner, but the phone never got past Liz Wagner. Audible in the background however was Kenderski whaling on Carrie Jeffries who was screaming, "No, Katie this is my pot pie."

"Dang," was all freshman Annie Smith could say.

Although she is now NCAA ineligible, all is not lost. She has received offers from the Chinese swim team and one from Eric Bischoff to join the NWO and wrestle either Lex Luger or Ric Flair on Monday Nitro as "Killer" Kenderski.

"I hope Luger tries to put me in that torture rack," a seething Kenderski was heard saying over a steak breakfast at Bub's Bar-B-Q. "I'll shove his wimpy ass off and torture him by racking his pea-brain with tables from my finance classes until it explodes. And, I heard the Nature Boy flunked geology."

"Woooooooooh!"

• Infuriated by the team leaving all of her luggage at the Atlanta airport, coach Elaine Sortino has punished the team with the most drastic measure that she could think of.

"We take so much time keeping the kids healthy and feeling great from nutritious, low-fat meals like salads, popcorn and skinless chicken," she said. "From now on they can only eat unspeakable foods like steak and french fries."

All but two players skipped town and most haven't been heard from since. Kiley Scofield was located when she was arrested on five counts of murder after starting a riot when a Maryland Sizzler ran out of fried shrimp on its buffet.

She, Tracey Osier and Danielle Henderson were attempting to hit a Sizzler in all 50 states. Harry and Tracey were separated from Kiley after an unfortunate incident with some bad anchovies at a Rhode Island pizzeria left them hospitalized in critical condition.

I hope we still make it to the World Series in Oklahoma City," Osier said. "I know this great Mexican place..."

Former UMass coach a reputed Mafia crime boss

By Maurice "The Bull-Shitter" Portland
Dissociated Press

NEW JERSEY — In a story which will come much to the surprise of sports fans, Italians, Minutemen and Nets alike, Sammy "The Bull" Gravano has alleged to Sports Illustrated writer Jackie MacMullan that former University of Massachusetts men's basketball coach John Calipari has held ties to the New York Gambino Mafia Family for the past 15 years, during which time he has served as both coach and local Godfather.

In another attempt to dismantle the remnants of the former John Gotti New York crime organization, Gravano has again revealed key information which could lead to a likely indictment of the once locally glorified "Don" Calipari as early as today. Gravano justified his actions by claiming that Calipari was in direct contact with Gotti during his trial as they conspired to kill him.

In addition to the ringleader Calipari, Gravano also named his associates in the alleged Amherst Mafia scandal. Current UMass coach Bruiser Flint, former assistant Bill Bayno, and current UMass point guard Charlton Clarke have all been identified by Gravano as having intricate roles in the local Calipari family.

Flint's organized crime roots date back to his adolescence in Philadelphia, where he once worked at the register of Giovanni's Pizza, which was owned by reputed mobster Vito Corleone. His illegal activity continued through his college years at St. Joseph's, where he acted as both a bookie and a buffer between students and convicted gambler Sonny Corleone. The current Minuteman coach's name was also mentioned as a possible suspect for a bomb which went off in Temple coach John Cheaney's mailbox in July of 1995; however, Flint's attorney and Corleone Family consigliere, Tom

Brazil's Rudinho banned from the world of international soccer

By Yor Mah
Collegian International Correspondent

BERLIN — If you thought the soccer career of Brazil's ageless superstar Rudinho was supposed to be over years ago, it is now.

Tears were shed, cats and dogs slept together (or even worse, the English and French), rioting evolved in the streets of Berlin and, oh yeah, a football... I mean... soccer match between the German and Brazilian national teams ended in controversy at Olympic Stadium.

A 2-2 draw in the final "friendly" before World Cup '98 concluded in a devastating display of disabling debauchery, as Rudinho — the 30-year-old (or more) executive consultant of the Massachusetts women's soccer program — ended his 30-year career in a blaze of maniacal manliness.

Brazilian coach Chris Chamidingo busted a nut in his sunburnt brain, and foolishly substituted Rudinho late into this not-so "friendly" for the FIFA World Player of the Year, Ronaldo. Only :13 after the substitution, the Satchell Paige of international football... I mean... soccer viciously elbowed not only striker Jurgen Klinsmann, but four other German players, en route to an immediate red card ejection.

In extra time, the bloodied and beaten Klinsraann scored the game-tying goal to end the match at 2-2.

Klinsmann had nothing to say after the match (due to obvious reasons), but Rudinho, who is unfortunately never at a loss for words, had his say.

"Ah, Klinsmann is a crybaby, and I just nudged him a little," Rudinho said, who will now assume the head coaching job for the Brazilian women's team, about the blow that forced emergency surgery on Klinsmann's jaw. "Hey, I thought I would go out there and try to give the team a little boost [while motioning upwards with his right elbow], but it didn't work out.

"Um, I guess I should say sorry, eh?"

Marcum announces UMass Hockey squad to go big-time

By Jarmo Kekolainen
Collegian Staff

After a disappointing season that saw the Massachusetts hockey team miss the Hockey East playoffs, Chancellor Scott announced this past weekend that the five-year-old program would immediately be dissolved, and Instead, try to become a professional franchise.

With a veritable plethora of Minutemen making a living at the professional level, a list that now includes freshman Matt Smith (who signed with the Worcester Ice Cats of the American Hockey League last week), UMass has officially given up on college hockey, and will try to make the jump to the pros as well.

"You had to see this coming," Scott said. "We were asinine to think we could make a dent in Jack Parker East, I mean, Hockey East. That wanker has a stranglehold on this conference, and we couldn't buy a goalscorer from the Boston area, even if we had NCAA permission. Damn, you can't go to the loo without a ball pass from that jerk.

"Almost all of our players are over 21 and will not stay for a full four years anyway, so what's the big whoop?"

Scott credited the potential jump from Div. I-AA to Div. I for the football program as the inspiration for the move, and UMass coach Joe Mallen was inspired as well.

"This is the best possible move for both the program and the school," Mallen said. "Can you believe it? We can give the kids who want to play hockey these days what they really want... money. And, it will be all on the up and up.

"Now, tell me, who is the glorified Div. III program disguised as a Div. I doormat now? Who lost to Maine at home in the conference playoffs? Um, New Hampshire?"

Jack Parker himself commented on the move, and believes that Merrimack College should do it as well, especially after they knocked BU out of the HE playoffs — at home.

"We need to get these pests out my league," Parker said. "They are like little bugs buzzing in my ear, and I want to crush them like this [while pinching his forefinger and thumb together]."

Select Board may allow Time-Out re-opening

By Paul Hayes
Collegian Staff

AMHERST— Time-In.

After months of lingering in sober darkness, the taps may once again be running under the bright lights at the Time- Out Sports Bar in downtown Amherst.

One former UMass student and two business partners have taken the first steps towards reopening the Time-Out Sports Bar, formerly located at 37 North Pleasant St. in Amherst.

Tom Murphy ('90) of Agawam, Mike McLaughlin of East Longmeadow and Dan Dineen of Connecticut — going under the name of McMurphy Incorporated — had their applications for a liquor license, a common victuallers license, and a coin-operated amusement permit approved by the Amherst Select Board on Monday night.

McMurphy Incorporated is nearing an agreement to buy Time-Out from former owner Michael Fusia. But before that can happen, more hurdles, including the state Alcoholic Beverage Control Commission's (ABCC) approval of their liquor license, must be cleared.

Murphy, who has managed the Cloverleaf Cafe in Enfield, Conn., for 10 years, said he wants to re-open the former Amherst center hot-spot because it is a great business opportunity, and it is in a great location.

But Murphy also cites personal reasons for the decision.

"I used to go to Time-Out, [re-opening it] is definitely a nostalgia thing," Murphy said. "It would be like owning a piece of UMass history."

Although they approved all applications by unanimous votes, Select Board members expressed their concern over how the men would prevent underaged drinking on their premises. In recent months both Time-Out and Pruddy's have had difficulty in preventing underaged drinking on their premises.

Select Board member Hill Boss warned Murphy, McLaughlin and their lawyer Steve Sousa of Springfield that they would be under intense scrutiny by the state ABCC.

"I believe when Amherst bars had their [liquor] licenses revoked or suspended, the owners didn't truly realize illegal actions were taking place," Boss said. "You'll have to be doubly and triply aware of the problems."

Murphy said if the deal goes through, he plans to take a number of steps to prevent underaged drinking. These steps include the installation of a machine which can validate newer drivers licenses with magnetic strips on them, and by being on the premises full-time.

The maximum occupancy rate will also be enforced, both for legal reasons and because exceeding it detracts from business, Murphy said.

"Students want to be able to breath," Murphy said.

The new incarnation of Time-Out would primarily be a bar, but will serve food such as hamburgers, sausages and french fries from lunchtime into the evening, and it is hoped the bar can cultivate a lunchtime crowd Murphy said.

The Amherst Brewing Company, located across from Time-Out at 24 North Pleasant St., is also a bar which serves food and could be seen as a threat to Time-Out's business. But Murphy said he didn't see them as competition, citing the fact that each establishment would have its own niche in the local bar market.

"[Having the Brewing Company nearby] just brings more customers into our vicinity," Murphy said. "Plus, students are bound to go around to each bar in the course of a night."

Olmos lectures at UMass

Actor and activist speaks about societal ills

By Juan Carlos Kaplan
Collegian Staff

Renowned actor and activist Edward James Olmos spoke at the University of Massachusetts Fine Arts Center Tuesday night as part of the ALANA Lecture Series and in collaboration with the Distinguished Visitors Program and Latinas Promoviendo Comunidad Lambda Pi Chi Sorority Inc.

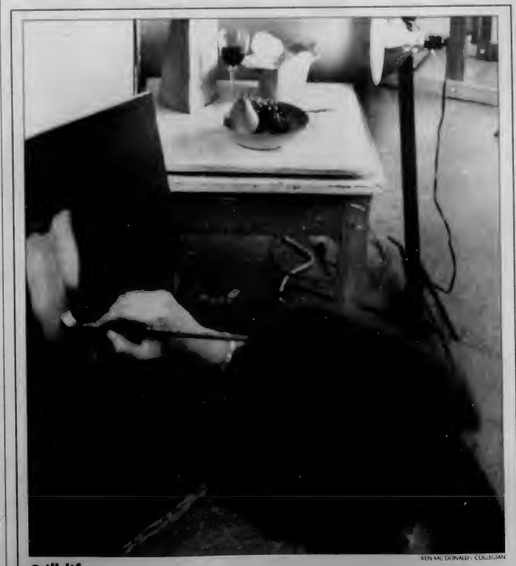
Olmos, 51, when not appearing on the silver screen, dedicates himself to his "other" career as a self-described statesman who tours the country giving up to 250 speeches annually on a wide range of social issues such as cultural diversity, violence and racial tolerance.

"All I've been doing is telling stories," he said in reference to his unique style of getting his message across. Combining very personal anecdotes with severe criticisms of how our society addresses cultural and racial issues Olmos had a much-smaller-than-anticipated audience cheering his poignant remarks.

"Don't ever speak about the United States of America without mentioning the Native Americans first." Olmos said as he pointed out the disparity in what we are taught in school. "We know too much about European-American heroes and not enough about African, Asian, Latino or Native American [ones]."

"You want to stop violence in America? Then feed our children self-esteem. The only thing you have is your own self-worth. When you have self-esteem and self-respect, you have everything," Olmos said, addressing the topic of violence in America, for which he has gained fame for his Lives in Hazard Educational Project that targets inner-city gangs. Olmos feels society is not addressing this social problem in the correct manner which he described as a disease.

"We have to stop treating violence as a judicial problem and start treating it as a health problem," he said.



Olmos, who grew up in East Los Angeles, got an early start in activism.

"My activism started in junior high school due to the inconsiderateness of the administration regarding a heat wave... they wouldn't let us out of class so I led a student protest... I really did activate human understanding first," Olmos said.

Olmos also criticized President Clinton for the multiple apologies the president has made during his trip in Africa.

"He didn't go far enough. He had

Clinton backs Israeli plan to pull out troops

WASHINGTON (AP) — The Clinton administration yesterday backed an offer by Israel to pull its troops out of Lebanon and called for direct negotiations between the two sides on new border arrangements.

Hundreds of Israeli soldiers, supported by mostly Christian militia, have manned an enclave inside Lebanon's side of the border since 1982 to keep terrorists from crossing into Israel to attack civilians.

The cost is high. Some 1,000 Israeli soldiers have been killed, making the operation unpopular. On Wednesday, the Israeli Cabinet accepted a 1979 U.N. Security Council resolution that called for a pullout with new security arrangements.

Lebanon reacted coolly. "Lebanon will not negotiate with Israel over the withdrawal," President Elias Hrawi said during a visit to the United Arab Emirates.

But Secretary of State Madeleine Albright was instantly receptive.

"We welcome the decision by the Israeli Cabinet," she said. "This is a positive step."

While the United States would like to see a wider Arab-Israeli settlement that involved Syria, "we understand the value of making progress where we can," she said.

States develop reports on affirmative action

CHICAGO (AP) — Illinois, Indiana and Michigan are publishing their own reports on affirmative action after the U.S. Commission on Civil Rights decided they were unbalanced and refused to release them.

"We were furious," Joseph Matheweon, chairman of the Illinois committee, told the Chicago Tribune. "We felt that our work was being ignored wrongly. They are now sitting as censors over these state committees that they are supposed to be listening to." The three reports conclude that affirmative action enjoys wide support in the three states. Illinois' report was issued Tuesday, although it may be illegal for the states to publish them. The national commission deadlocked 4-4 on a motion to accept the three reports last year. The four commissioners who voted no say they have accepted reports from other states, but that these three were too one-sided, the Tribune reported yesterday.

The reports consist mostly of statements submitted by people from around each state. In Illinois, contributors include such figures as Chicago Urban League President James Compton and Ameritech Illinois President Douglas Whitley.

During debate, Commissioner Carl Anderson complained that the Michigan report includes 20 statements supporting affirmative action and just one opposing it.

SGA approves elections; Wong gives last speech

By Jill Carroll
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts Student Government Association (SGA) voted to ratify the elections for president and student trustee during last night's meeting, however the elections still face the potential of being nullified at a student judiciary meeting today.

Despite the senate's ratification of the elections, the final decision to ratify or nullification will be decided by the student judiciary today.

"Regardless if it was ratified or not [last night], [today] it will go to the student judiciary to where the final decision on nullification will be decided," Lisa Cook, speaker of the senate, said.

In a meeting today the student judicare will be hearing petitions that are calling for nullification of the elections. If these petitions are decided by the judiciary to be true the elections will be nullified.

"If they find something unconstitutional they can vote to nullify the elections. But of they find there are no problems then they will vote to ratify it," Gregory Lozier, SGA justice said.

The senate ratification might be taken into account by the judiciary.

"They might take into account the senate ratification but I'm not really sure about that," Lozier said.

There was heated debate over ratifying the elections.

Senator Jodi Bailey (Commuter at-large) gave reasons why the elections should not be ratified.

"Students should be allowed to have their voices heard. By ratify-

Experts say Jones case weak from start

By Laurie Asseo
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Legal experts seconded a federal judge's finding yesterday that Paula Jones raised "no genuine issues for trial" in her sexual harassment lawsuit against President Clinton. Many said her case was weak from the start.

"She wasn't able to show any negative job consequences," Northwestern University law professor Cynthia Bowman said after Mrs. Jones' lawsuit was dismissed by a federal judge in Arkansas. "There was never any showing that the environment of her job was hostile to her because of her sex."

"She had a very, very weak case," said San Francisco lawyer Philip Kay. "I generally don't even consider taking a sexual harassment case unless there was an element of serious unwanted physical touching."

"This is not a case I would have ever brought," added Kay, who won a $3.7 million damage award in 1994 of a former secretary at a law firm over harassment.

Mrs. Jones' lawsuit said then-Gov. Clinton exposed himself and propositioned her in a Little Rock, Ark., hotel room in 1991. At the time, she was a state employee. Clinton denied the allegation. In throwing out the case, U.S. District Judge Susan Webber Wright said Mrs. Jones did not show that she suffered any "tangible job detriment" or that the alleged incident created an abusive working environment.

"Reduced to its essence, the record taken as a whole could not lead a rational trier of fact to find [for Mrs. Jones] and the Court therefore finds that there are no genuine issues for trial in this case."

Her lawyer, John Whitehead, said an appeal was likely.

"We haven't lost. We lost one round," asserted Mrs. Jones' lawyer, John Whitehead. "We just think that any time you challenge the most powerful man in the world, you have a tough case." New York lawyer Gregory Joseph, who was not involved in the case, said it was not safe to assume that the appeal would be rejected.

But Washington University law professor Jane Aiken said Mrs. Jones' case "has been on shaky legal ground from the very beginning" because it was based on a single incident and did not demonstrate how that alleged incident affected her job.

Sexual harassment cases are "not easy cases to prove," said Marcia Greenberger of the National Women's Law Center.

"There has to be enough of a harassing act to rise to the level of actual discrimination, and that means affecting the conditions of the job in a tangible way," Greenberger said. "We don't have a history in this country of sexual harassment cases based on... one-time events prevailing in court."

Washington lawyer Lawrence Lorber, who often represents employers in such cases, said he always thought Mrs. Jones' case was a weak one.

"It went haywire" in recent days, he added, when her lawyers filed papers alleging that Clinton sexually assaulted a woman many years ago but neglected to include her sworn denial. The woman was identified in the papers by name.

ing these elections not all students could get their voices heard," Bailey said. "There were no absentee ballots [at polling stations] — that is highly illegal. It's in the constitution that you have to have absentee ballots. Write-in votes were discouraged, students were allowed to vote for invalid candidates."

Senator Benjamin Gaumond (Southwest, IQA) said the elections should be ratified to fill the positions.

"There will be no student voice heard on the board [of Trustees]. Students themselves have to deal with this that is grave. Let democracy prevail that is the bottom line on this," Gaumond said.

Bailey was also concerned the senate would ratify the elections only to have them nullified by the judiciary.

"To ratify this and have it nullified tomorrow it would make us look inept," Bailey said.

Senator Asif Sayani said a lower voter turn out because of the mistakes made did not impact the outcome of the elections.

"Voter turnout was taken as a sample of the population. No matter how big the sample is multiplied the elections would have been in favor of who won," Sayani said. "The candidates who won are the people student wanted to win."

Senator Ricardo Rodriguez (Southwest at-large) questioned Sayani.

"If any one student is not given the right to vote, any one student then the whole process is messed up. If one student could not vote is that democracy," Rodriguez said.

"Yeah" Sayani said.

Amy Pellegrino was sworn in as president after the motion passed and encouraged students to let their senators know if they are dissatisfied.

"If students are really upset with the ratification they can call up their senator and say 'this isn't right,'" Pellegrino said. "It just needed to get done there was an election I won and the senate ratified it"

Eleanor Court was not at the meeting at the time the motion was passed and could not be sworn in as Student Trustee.

Lia Wong gave her farewell address as SGA president.

"I want to recognize all the students who put in the time, effort, and dedication to work for the interest of the student body," Wong said.

the opportunity and he blew it... so the message would be heard here in America," Olmos said.

Olmos discussed the inherent racism in the European representation of Jesus Christ.

"The Church still doesn't get it," Olmos said regarding European culture's appropriation of a "blonde and blue-eyed" Jesus Christ. "They [European culture] don't realize they made race the issue the day they made him [Jesus] white."

"We have a very difficult ego... we are not inclusive but exclusive," Olmos said about the racial problems that exist in America.

In perhaps the most emotional moment of the evening, Olmos spoke of the meaning of forgiveness using an anecdote the story of a family who had adopted the teenage killer of their 8-year-old son.

"The whole understanding of forgiveness is the key to my life," Olmos said.

"You have to lead by example," he said summing up his discourse.

For UMass freshman Jeanan Haddad, Olmos' lecture was very effective.

"I like listening to people who teach in a diverse way... who share their ideas," Haddad said.

"I was speechless. I agree with everything he said on diversity," freshman biology major Mandi Ing said after leaving the Fine Arts Center.

"On this campus you don't get a lot of things of this nature," junior Damaris Rodriguez said.

In addition to the UMass community, Olmos' audience was comprised of middle school and high school students from the surrounding areas including students participating in Holyoke Community College's Upward Bound program which is a federally funded program that targets economically disadvantaged youth.

"This is an excellent opportunity for students to get a role model. There aren't many male Hispanics to choose from," co-organizer Paula Dalpes said, noting that her group is 70 percent Latinos and African-Americans.

invitation to the campus

Dear readers,

One behalf of the staff of The Massachusetts Daily Collegian, I would like to extend an invitation to our Spring '98 Open House this Monday from 11 a.m. to 4 p.m. in 113 Campus Center. Each semester, we open the doors of our offices and give members of the UMass community the opportunity to find out how the paper is produced each day.

More importantly, the Open House is a good way for undergraduates interested in working for the Collegian to find out how they can become involved. If you are an aspiring young writer looking to develop a portfolio of clips, the Collegian is a tremendous resource. As a writer for New England's largest college daily, you will write about and photograph the biggest names and events that hit the valley. In the past few semesters, staffers have garnered interviews with the likes of Conan O'Brien, Tricky, Wyclef Jean, The Verve, The Indigo Girls, Senator Edward Kennedy, Dean Smith, Jerry Tarkanian, and Rick Pitino to name a few. From major concerts and sporting events to political debates, your student newspaper provides solid hands-on reporting experience that places you in the trenches with nationally recognized writers.

However, the Collegian isn't just a place for budding wordsmiths to develop their writing. Is graphic arts or web design your thing? Then you need to be a part of our production staff responsible not only for the visual aspects of the paper itself, but the majority of its advertising as well. What better way to wow a perspective employer than with a portfolio full of professional-quality ads you designed or as a member of the Collegian's up-and-coming on-line edition? Maybe you spend your days in SOM dreaming of owning your own company or holding down that big corner office on Madison Ave. If that's the case, the Collegian offers tremendous experience in sales, finance, operations, and promotions. As a financially independent RSO, you can be part of a team that manages a sizeable small business.

Whatever your strength or interest, the Collegian is a great place to gain the practical experience that will help you advance when you've left Amherst in the dust.

As applications for fall '98 positions are currently being accepted, now is a great time to start thinking about what you'll be doing next semester. Do you want to be reading the Collegian in between classes in the fall, or do you want to be a part of something great?

Time for gun control

Everytime a gun in this country is sold, a free gift certificate for sterilization should be given with it. That way, we could be assured that people with guns couldn't bear any children. Or maybe just a mandatory IQ test would suffice; if your IQ is below 40, maybe you shouldn't be allowed to carry firearms. Because anyone with an average intellect wouldn't have a gun in the same home as their child.

Julie Fialkow

I am deeply angered by what happened in Arkansas, but far from stunned. Why did the families of those kids have a collection of guns when there was even a slight possibility a child could gain access to them? One of the boy's weapons came from his grandfather. He was a hunter, he said on TV. He told the boy he should only use guns for target practice and never aim them at people. Gee. 13-year-olds are known to strictly obey their elders. Did Grandpa believe his grandson, too, when he promised never to look at the dirty magazines in Grandpa's tackle box? When your child/grandson's history includes possibly molesting small children, maybe a little extra supervision is in order. Wake up, gramps. I know you didn't expect your little darling to kill five innocent people, but don't plead complete innocence. The families of these two boys carry a great deal of responsibility in this tragedy.

OK, what really bothers me is why do people in Jonesboro, Ark. need handguns? To protect themselves from the Arkansas chapter of the Crypts and Bloods? In case their chickens want to step to them? People from cities say they need handguns to protect themselves. It's a matter of life and death, and I can't say I completely sympathize with that argument, but I can understand it at least. But regardless of whether you live in Jonesboro or L.A., if you have children in your home, there is no excuse for owning a weapon. The room for accidents is just far too great. If you don't believe me, think back to that "90210" episode where Brian's best friend shot himself pretending to be a cowboy. (Nothing represents reality more than "90210" — nothing.)

> " But regardless of whether you live in Jonesboro or L.A., if you have children in your home, there is no excuse for owning a weapon."

I realize some people have handguns because they enjoy the sport of target shooting. It requires less physical strength than using a rifle, and is more convenient. It is a shame that a few careless people ruin it for those that are responsible and respect safety above all else. But the sad fact is there are too many careless people wandering around to just pretend that they don't exist. It's unfortunate that we can't all do what we want, but life is too precious to waste on a hobby.

Most small town folk, I presume, own rifles, not handguns, both of which were used in the Arkansas school shooting. Rifles are used for both hunting and target shooting. While I would never have the audacity to suggest we stop killing deer, (we'd have no creepy plaques with giant heads nailed to them), I do wonder if most of the rifles are put in hands that have absolutely no intentions of hunting animals.

I also wonder why the rifle has to be in the house with a child, when hunting season is only a small part of the year. Maybe rifles could be rented out only when their is an overpopulation of a certain animal and it's hunting season. With renting, you could have a constant monitor of who has the guns and for how long. You could also make guidelines for rental application more specific and difficult; not just limiting it to people who can breathe.

According to the Daily Texan, suicides and accidents account for more than half of the 38,000 Americans who die of gunshots wounds yearly. Four children and one teacher became part of that statistic last week. The two children that committed the murders are only partially to blame. The Daily Texan also reports that over 210 million guns are in circulation in this country, clearly an excessive amount. I blame not only Grandpa, but every manufacturer and every store that has anything to do with handing one of those 210 million guns to somebody like Grandpa.

Viva la policia

While vacationing in sunny, fun-filled Cancun over Spring Break, two of my friends almost didn't make it back. This is their courageous story and the lessons learned.

It was Wednesday evening, two days before our scheduled departure, and, hoping not to spend much money, a group of about seven of us decided to go to a club with no cover charge. We mobilized, caught the bus, and upon arrival, were annoyed to find a line about a block long surrounding the outside of the club.

Joe Sullivan

Voicing our frustration with the wait to enter the club, and putting this in the context of it being late and the fact that we had partied earlier, myself and two of my friends decided to call it a night.

We walked until we found a bus stop, but before we got there, my two friends were in the bushes on the lagoon side of the road (Cancun surrounds a lagoon) next to a Mexican guy who in Spanish commented, laughing, "Adding more water to the lagoon."

About one minute later, the police pulled up, and our Mexican comrade made a run for it, frantically shouting "Policia!" as he ran. My two friends were apprehended, placed in the back of a paddy wagon, told they were urinating on public property, and offered the choice of spending 36 hours in jail (meaning they would miss our flight back), or paying 300 pesos, which is about $40.

There were three officers, but only one really doing the hassling, so in the meantime, I asked one of the passive participants, "Where is the police station?" and he answered, in English, "I don't speak English, ask him," pointing towards the man dictating options to my two bladder- emptying friends. The head officer just ignored me when I asked him the same question.

Knowing that Mexican jail was not an option, the three of us gave the officer in charge all the money we had, which only amounted to about $30. One of my two friends pleaded with him to let us go without paying the full fine, and at this point he took me aside and attempted to charge me with drug possession for no good reason.

After searching me illegally (by U.S. standards) and finding nothing, the head guy told me to wait behind the paddy wagon where my friends were still being held. Even though it was 1 a.m., he came back 30 seconds later telling us he had radioed the judge who graciously approved the $30 rather than $40 fine. We were told to stay out of trouble for the rest of the trip; otherwise we would be flat out thrown in jail, no questions. As the head officer told us this, the two officers not involved were smiling and laughing to themselves.

From this harrowing incident there are several questions left unanswered, but also a couple of important conclusions.

The most questionable part of this whole incident is our Mexican friend who disappeared when the police showed up. Was he there to set us up, to banter with us long enough for the police to act? It seemed like too much of a coincidence that the police arrived so soon after him.

There's obviously the question of police procedure — was the option of fine or imprisonment legal without a hearing?

Finally, there's the question, "Where's the police station?" While traversing Cancun and surrounding areas for a week, I never saw a police station, and the officers' response to this question seemed to indicate it was non-existent.

The most important conclusion to be made from this incident is that the police we encountered were corrupt. It was obvious that we were being harassed for the fact that we had money the police could get by preying on the fact that we knew, when confronted by them, we had no legal options for resistance because Mexico is not the United States.

The second most important conclusion (which should be taken to heart) is that we Americans who visit Mexico, or any country for that matter, have created an environment where situations like the one my friends and I experienced happen as a response to our own lack of respect for the people in whose country we are guests. Our behavior on this night was concurrent with the behavior of many of the other Americans I saw in Cancun that week — obnoxious, unruly and indignant.

We're looking for columns about the SGA for next week.

What do you have to say about SGA's future, how it can reform itself or how could it be more useful to the student body?

Any columns should be about 800 words, typed and spell-checked and brought to the Collegian office at 113 Campus Center basement or e-mailed to letters@oitvms.oit.umass.edu, by Monday at noon.

Call Tamar Carroll or Mike Messaros at 545-1491 for more information.

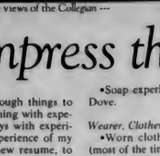
My resume sucks.



It's not that I don't have enough things to put on it, but I don't have anything with experience. If I'm going to battle out old guys with experience for a job, I need to have some experience of my own. So I wrote a rough draft of my new resume, to include the only experiences I have of any length.

I'd like you to check it out for me.

P.S. It's my birthday today — 23 years young and still in college, what a coup. If you didn't get me a card, I'll understand. At least this year, I didn't write a depressing column about how old I'm getting. But that's just because I've accepted it.

I'm old.

Now get the hell off my lawn, or I'll call your mom.

Letters to the Editor

Students should take more responsibility

To the editor:

There is an old saying that goes something like "Denial is more than a river in Egypt." It also appears that denial is a cloud that hangs over the United States in general and the UMass campus in particular. I am referring in particular to Select Board member Hill Boss's comments in early February regarding low student voter turnout and student alcohol use.

My wife and I are homeowners and are trying to raise two boys, one seven and one three, as best we can. We realize that we live in the real world (even though many Amherst citizens may disagree) where alcohol is as much an accepted part of society as cable television. Therefore, the reaction of the Student Government Association to Mr. Boss's comments did not surprise me.

As parents, we will be taking responsibility for how our children handle alcohol within the next 10 years. As homeowners, we take pride in the scenic beauty that the town provides us, and take the responsibility to maintain that scenic beauty. This pride is obviously a foreign concept to people who drift in and out of town for four years.

It seems that there is an unwillingness on the UMass campus to take responsibility for both low voter turnout and student alcohol-fueled brawls that take place every weekend both on and off campus.

Upcoming SGA events

To the editor:

I would like to apologize for the recent three-ring circus the Student Government Association (SGA) has been calling the executive, the legislative and the judiciary. Being at the epicenter, I can assure you I have been trying to bring all parties and their grievances to the table in a private setting, rather than a public setting. These matters will hopefully be resolved through compromise rather than parliamentary maneuvers. If you have something to say about the way things are going, the office phone number is 545-03451.

All that aside, I want to shed some light on things that have taken a back burner to the current business of the day. A special project that is in the works is a possible "Spring Weekend" to offset the gap left by cancelling the Spring Concert. University Productions and Concerts (UPC) and the SGA want to jointly foster programming the weekend of May 8-9. UPC is planning a concert for each of those nights, along with presenting local bands during the day. We are seeking programming possibilities from Registered Student Organizations (RSOs). This can be a great community building event.

Also, I know people are concerned about Spring Concert '99. UPC is looking for people to help out in anyway possible. Find out what they are all about. Their office is on the second floor of the Student Union.

Another issue is the new Campus Center. Some of us may still be here when the project is finished; most of us will not. However, this project will forever change the face of our University and it is vital that student input figures strongly into the final result. RSOs, do you want more space, or space in general? Are you sick of the Campus Center acting as a conference center closed to students, but conveniently located in the middle of our University? Please get involved.

For all those interested in campus safety, the SGA Women's Issues Committee is co-sponsoring the second annual Campus Safety Walk on April 23 at 7 p.m. at the Student Union Steps. Campus safety affects everyone on this campus, from students to administrators, faculty to staff. We will be covering the same routes as last year, plus additional ones. We will evaluate progress made on last year's recommendations, plus make new recommendations for additional lighting and call box placement. I am seeking volunteers to help out. The more people attending, the more routes we can cover. Please call the SGA if you are interested.

SGA Senator

Ratify SGA elections

To the editor:

I thank the Collegian for taking the initiative to support ratification of the election in the policy editorial that ran Monday, 3/30. I am proud to announce that the Student Government Association (SGA) Senate finally had election ratification on the agenda for last night's meeting. The Elections Procedure Select Committee, which I head, voted to put it on the agenda March 30.

However, there have been attempts to curtail the ratification process using technicalities that I deem invalid. The Associate Speaker of the Senate, Lisa Cook, insists on saying that my committee is not using the correct procedure for ratifying these elections.

Lisa Cook would have us believe that, since the Elections Commission did not submit an Election Report within 48 hours, the Senate has no method for ratifying the elections. This erroneous interpretation of the Constitution is unacceptable, and as chairman of the Elections Procedure Committee, I do not feel bound by it.

It is time for people to stop utilizing legal technicalities that unnecessarily thwart the democratic process. The students of this great University have spoken loudly; it is time for some of our student leaders to take their ear plugs off and listen to the students' screams.

WOMEN IN ROCK

Who says music is a man's world?

The unique dynamic females bring to co-ed rock

With Ani DiFranco coming to town this weekend to play the biggest headlining date of her career (selling more tickets than last semester's 311 and Counting Crows Mullins Center shows combined), it seems like an appropriate time to look at the vitally important — and often overlooked — role women play in music.

In many respects, DiFranco presents the ideal case study of a strong independent woman. She can rightfully claim to have made it on her own in the male-dominated music world playing by her rules. Even if her music sucked — and it doesn't — DiFranco deserves to be a source of inspiration, not just for women, but for aspiring musicians everywhere.

MARTY KEANE

A folkie in punk clothes, DiFranco has successfully battled against the Goliath of corporate rock to emerge as one of the most influential cult heroines of the decade. True to her DIY ethic, she releases her albums through her own indie label, Righteous Babe Records, and has slowly but steadily built a devout grass-roots following on the strengths of a relentless touring schedule, literally building her audience one at a time.

An ardent feminist and an open bisexual, her songs tackle issues like rape, abortion and anger. DiFranco is unique because she tempers the emotional intensity of these sensitive topics with a poignant candor through her singer- songwriter confessionalism and a clever sardonic wit.

DiFranco has become more than merely a blip on the radar screen, due in large measure to a growing acceptance of female singer-songwriters outside their small but loyal fanbases.

The Alanis effect:

With the intense spotlight of the music world shining down recently in the post-Alanis aftermath, women in popular music have been the focus of a seemingly endless stream of rah-rah stories each touting the advancement that the female species has made in recent times.

Rolling Stone's 30th anniversary issue was written completely by women and about them.

Unfortunately, much of the attention has in fact, cheapened the impact of women in music. It's as if women just started making great music after seeing Alanis Morissette flailing her head and whining about going down on

Turn to WOMEN, page 9

Women have always played an important role in the making of music. The phrase "behind every great man is an even greater woman" largely rings true. A look back at some of history's most significant ensembles and groups shows what a dramatic effect the co-ed factor can have in the band dynamic.

• The career and marriage of Ike and Tina Turner played out like a soap opera, and ended in a long, protracted legal battle that tarnished both for many years. There was a time though, where the Ike and Tina Turner Revue was one of the hottest, most durable, and potentially most explosive acts around.

MARTY KEANE

Fronted by Tina, with one of the rawest, most sensual, and impossibly dynamic voices in black music, the Ike and Tina Revue that set the blueprint for musical discipline while manifesting nearly unbearable tension, eventually giving in to wave upon wave of catharsis. The purging of one's soul through sheer vocal ability is a unique talent that few have been bequeathed. Listen and learn.

• After running out of ideas as a blues-rock outfit, Mick Fleetwood wanted to turn Fleetwood Mac into a more contemporary rock 'n roll group, but needed help. Along came the almost mystical dynamic between Lindsay Buckingham and Stevie Nicks. Asked to join the band in 1975, the duo revived the Mac's creative and commercial fortunes.

Not only did the pair write songs, but each brought distinctive talents the band had been lacking. Nicks' husky voice, along with her sexy, hippie-gypsy stage persona brought women to the forefront at a time when lesser arena bands like Blue Oyster Cult and Kansas dominated.

Along with the maniacal guitar playing of Buckingham, the male- female juxtaposition brought the group the success they'd been lacking.

The fraying behind-the-scenes that was taking place between Buckingham and Nicks, as well as John and Christine McVie came to an apex on their legendary 1977 album, Rumours. The folk-ish "Gold Dust Woman" (covered by Courtney Love and Hole in 1996) and the melancholy "Dreams" illustrate just how much depth and emotion Nicks is capable of.

The '90s have seen a continued exploration of the endless possibilities of male-female tension with a plethora of co-ed rock bands that have successfully tamed what many deride as the omnipresent male voice in rock with a hearty dose of anti-dote to the testosterone-fueled rampages that ushered the decade in. Sensitivity and emotion is in, folks.

Bands like the Mazzy Star, the now-defunct Velocity Girl, Pulp and Sonic Youth have kept the tradition alive.

Robert Altman still weird

Gingerbread Man unlike anything previously done by Grisham

THE GINGERBREAD MAN
Directed by Robert Altman with Kenneth Branagh, Embeth Davidtz, Robert Downey Jr.
Playing at Northampton Academy of Music

The Gingerbread Man, a movie based on a story by Hollywood punter Bus John Grisham, proves not that maverick director Robert Altman has finally yielded to studio pressure, but that he is still a weirdo. Grisham's story is more of a restraint than a framework here, and that tension keeps the movie from succeeding as either a personal statement or a Hollywood thriller.

While Grisham's work is tightly paced and laced with healthy paranoia, it is a stretch to think of it as more than a diversion. But movies can become more than the source material through visual detail and direction. Although most Grisham movies, like The Pelican Brief, settle for the same mild thrills the stories give, Grisham's mediocrity can be transcended, as Francis Ford Coppola's disappointingly underrated The Rainmaker proved.

On the surface, Coppola sticks closely to the story, telling it so cleanly and smoothly the movie hums, but there is more. Besides his technical skill, Coppola's tender hand with his actors shines through, and Matt Damon and Claire Danes bloom together on screen. What could have been an ordinary courtroom drama becomes a surprisingly moving treatment of human vulnerability. While Coppola stays within the bounds of the story and simply deepens it, Altman veers completely off course.

The Gingerbread Man begins with a long, high overhead shot of a wild, mysterious landscape rushing by, accompanied with an eerie mixture of static, music and bits of phone conversation. The first scene and the whole first half of the movie are fantastically unlike anything Grisham would ever write and absolutely wonderful.

Kenneth Branagh's forceful, decent, arrogant lawyer is sucked into the life of Embeth Davidtz's tormented waitress by his desperate need for justice and, more importantly, control. The slow descent into moral confusion and darkness is so atmospheric it is almost tactile. The movie's use of light is astonishing, the outdoor

Rose is highly enchanting film

By Anna Feder
Collegian Staff

MA VIE EN ROSE
Directed by Alain Berliner with Georges du Fresne, Michele Baroque
Playing at Pleasant St. Theater

There are few words to describe the visual lushness and emotional potency that characterize Alain Berliner's second film Ma Vie En Rose. The story begins with Ludovic, a 7-year-old "girlboy" (as he self-defines) donning his sister's pink princess dress and presenting himself at his parents housewarming party. This of course creates a myriad of problems in his stereotypical oppressive suburban neighborhood. Everyone, including his parents, want to dismiss his affinity for girls clothes as a phase. But Ludo's budding preference proves to be more than cloth-deep. Tensions escalate when Ludo announces his plans to marry the son of his father's boss when "he's not a boy."

Many "coming out" stories begin with people poking their head out of the closet as early as the tender age of two, but rarely are we able to witness the ramifications of that experience. With the new trend of adult movies from a child's point-of-view we are actually privileged to see what few who've shared Ludo's experience can actually remember. You get the sense that everyone around him is "just confused" whereas he is the only one who is completely certain of himself and what he wants. Any attempts to shatter his reality are easily explained with a child's logic, "God forgot my girl X [chromosome] and gave me a Y by accident."

The saturated colors sets and costumes in the film allow us to see the richness and optimism of Ludo's view of the world. When this world begins to crack and the sky threatens to fall, he escapes into the world of Pam and Ben (Barbie and Ken). These fantasy sequences allow Ludo a safe place in pink plastic and white lace where he is loved an accepted.

The director himself is ambiguous as to what message he's trying to convey through the film. "More than many films It belongs to the people who see It. People will identify based on their own experiences. I don't want to offer my own vision and risk distorting theirs. I wanted to make a film that was open."

The film is essentially about tolerance, whether it be of transvestitism, homosexuality, or any of the numerous differences that set people apart. It is clear that in receiving Ludo's point of view we are allowed to identify with him in a unique way. As viewers we're allowed to say things that aren't expressly said in terms of who he is and what lies ahead for him.

Ma Vie En Rose is at times light-hearted with its seriousness in small easy to take doses. It is as much of an essential viewing experience for children as it is for adults. An enchantingly beautiful and highly original film, it deserves as many accolades as can be given. A

Guy Davis sounds like textbook

On April 28, Red House Records will release country bluesman Guy Davis' third effort, You Don't Know My Mind.

Although this CD has several highlights, it is ultimately very average and lacks what the blues is — authentic pain, suffering and heartache. Davis sounds like he has learned the blues via a textbook, when the only way the blues can be truly known is through living them.

There are several tracks on this CD which are horrendously overproduced — ironic when, traditionally, country blues has been an intimate, acoustic expression. "Best I Can," the first track, is lyrically awkward with boring and overdone music. "If You Love Somebody" is ruined by obnoxious background vocals. "Georgia Flood," though set to tell a good story, is monotonous, and "Home Cooked Meal" seems to utilize a drum machine — unacceptable.

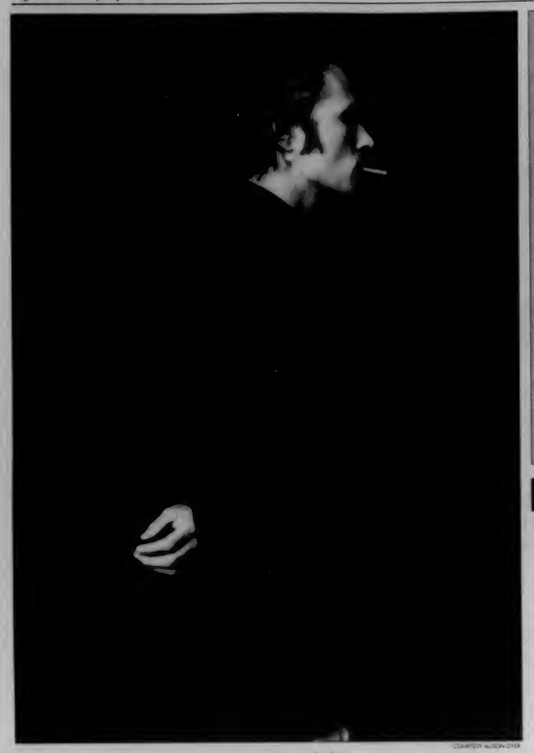
There are four highlights on this disk. "You Remembered My Name" features a lone Davis playing a very down home guitar and singing sparingly, but soulfully, and the all- instrumental "Dorothy Is Harlem Bound" and simple but pensive, "If I Could Fly (like An Eagle" further show that Davis can really play. "Marlboro Blues" is also well-done, showing some fancy finger picking.

Overall though, Davis needs to lend more emotion to his work on this one.

This month, Legacy releases a Thelonius Monk double disk, Live At The It Club, which recaptures Monk's working quartet's Halloween and Nov. 1, 1964 performances at the now defunct LA nightspot.

The CD includes three bonus tracks and 11 tracks presented for the first time as they were performed.

Each track on the two CDs is performed in the same format of cohesive riffing by the whole quartet, solos, and a return to the main riff, and while this makes it somewhat tedious to listen to all the way through, each track sees Monk exhibiting his unique style of choppy, dissonance and tenor saxophonist Charlie Rouse smoothly grasping each solo.



"Blue Monk" opens the set with a cool aloofness and foretells a metropolitan feeling that transcends the entire recording. The version of "Round Midnight" should also be heard for the fact that it is accelerated into double time, replacing the song's sadness with an expression of irritation.

On the second disk, Monk's shouts and jeers to his bandmates make every track urgent.

Monk is a jazz legend, and the unearthing of this recording is an event worth experiencing, but probably better done in small doses.

Scott Weiland delves into self-abuse on his new solo release, 12 Bar Blues.

all over the album. Weird sounds jump out at you from everywhere. Synths, cellos, vibraphone and theremin are all listed as being used, but none of them threaten to take over the individual songs, thanks to producer Daniel Lanius. "About Nothing" is a nice little rocker that exists only to rock a bit, which provides a nice little breath on this album.

Weiland, though, will always be remembered for his band's lack of creativity than for anything else. Stone Temple Pilots seemed to borrow from all sources, from Led Zeppelin to Pearl Jam to T. Rex. Now, it could be easy to dismiss much of Weiland's involvement in this larceny if you take into account that STP was basically guitar driven. At the same time, though, it was the vocal melody that stole, hard-core, from "Jumpin' Jack Flash." On this album, we get "Cool Kiss," which lifts not only its title, but its verse melody from Girls Against Boys' far superior "Click Click."

Other things go wrong on this album. "Lady, Your Roof Brings Me Down," which was on the Great Expectations soundtrack, should never have been down. The song is bad tin pan alley style writing, and never really hits the spot. And Scott, about your lyrics. Not once, not twice, but thrice is, ahem... self-abuse mentioned. Come on now, I think Bob Dylan has yet to touch on that subject. Take a cue.

In the end this album's main sin is that it overreaches. While trying to distance himself, he has overshot the mark. He has produced an album that while showing promise, still lacks vision, direction and self-control. Hey! Just like his old band. It just goes to show that the apple doesn't fall far from the tree in the long run.

Jerry Cantrell, on the other hand, doesn't emerge unscathed from his solo outing. This album arrives on your doorstep like a flaming bag. Plus, anytime I see that Les Claypool is a guest on an album, as he is here, warning bells go off in my head.

The album is generic, full of riffs stolen from his Alice in Chains rehearsals, full of the same level distortion and the same chunky stop/start patterns. What separates this from an Alice in Chains album is the vocals. Before, we'd get Layne Stanley's rangeless, but at least interesting (to a point), voice, here we have to suffer through Jerry's sissy delivery — he's a poor man's Geddy Lee.

The songs are pretty much the same, although once in a while he throws a piano or acoustic guitars into the mix. Great. "Cut You In," the second cut on the disc, will be our scapegoat for now. With lyrics about how he wants to "turn off the phone/ lose myself," there's really no way to hold your attention, especially with the music being so unexciting. I wouldn't mind him getting lost either, as long as it's far, far away from any means of recording. And surprise! — there may be a drug reference or two if you look closely enough, kiddies.

Other songs suffer from just too much Jerry. "Settling Down" is over six minutes long. What was the producer thinking? Another, "Breaks My Back," is more than seven minutes long. Plus, he adds voice effects. And once again you have to wonder when the producer fell asleep at the wheel. Speaking of drug references, this is an overdose of Cantrell.

So, looking back on what we've learned today: Weiland has a promising future if he cuts down on the self abuse references and maybe tightens up the writing. On the other hand, Jerry Cantrell shouldn't quit his day job.

Dion honored, princes on vacation

(AP) — As if wearing the Titanic necklace wasn't enough, Celine Dion has a new honor.

The Quebec native will be made an officer in the Order of Canada, Gov. Gen. Romeo LeBlanc said last week.

The honor goes to those who exemplify "the highest qualities of citizenship" by making contributions that "enrich the lives of their contemporaries," he said. She will receive the insignia May 1.

The bejeweled Dion sang "My Heart Will Go On" at the Oscars.

Earl Spencer called land mines an "obscenity" and said he will carry on the crusade of his sister, the late Princess Diana, against them.

Spencer's visit to Cambodia, one of the world's most heavily mined countries, follows a wish of Diana's that he journey here with her to make a documentary.

"Our film can never come to fruition, of course, but our conversations have compelled me to complete her wish in some way, by coming here myself," he said.

Spencer spoke at the graduation of students who learn to fit artificial limbs. About 300 people are killed or maimed by mines each month in Cambodia.

He said he cared little about mines until Diana "forced me, and many others, to face up to the obscenity that land mines represent."

Diana died last August in a Paris car crash.

The battle of the "Gs" is over. Country star Garth Brooks and rapper Warren G. said they're dropping trademark infringement lawsuits against each other over use of the letter in their logos.

Warren G. uses a fattened "G" with "funk music" written inside. Brooks' logo is an unadorned "g" in a circle.

The media behaved last week and was rewarded with the chance to take pictures of Britain's vacationing princes.

Charles, 15-year-old William and 13-year-old Harry posed for photographers near the summit of Whistler Mountain on the second day of their stay.

"I'm grateful to you all for leaving us alone," Charles said. "It makes such a difference."

His comments came a day after a royal official criticized crews from three Canadian TV stations for shooting footage of Charles near a ski lift. The official warned that access would be canceled if photographers took any more pictures of the royals.

Things certainly are looking up for Celine Dion, as she will be made an Officer of Canada on May 1.

Carter curse hits TV's newest programs

By Frazier Moore
Associated Press

NEW YORK — It was just about a year ago that CBS announced "Four Corners" as one of the coming season's sparkling new series.

Just about a year later, "Four Corners," the saga of a ranching family with Ann-Margret as matriarch, finally premiered. That was in February. Then, after its second airing, "Four Corners" was put out to pasture.

Lousy ratings. Oops! Maybe someone forgot that the last time an idea like this really won over viewers, Jimmy Carter was president. Of course, Carter was in the White House the last time Mary Tyler Moore had a hit series. And yet, a prospective sitcom for ABC's 1998-99 schedule would reunite her with Valerie Harper in their beloved Mare-and-Rhoda roles of a quarter-century ago. Surely viewers can't be blamed if they hear a twisted version of that Peggy Lee song echoing in their heads: "Is that all there is? Then let's keep flipping." It's as good a theme as any to accompany the six broadcast networks, just weeks from unveiling their fall lineups, while they sweep up the wreckage of the season nearly done.

A front-page story in the current Variety declares, "Nets lack hour of power." It notes that 20 dramatic hours debuted this year, with all save two — the refreshingly offbeat "Ally McBeal" and "Dawson's Creek" — getting a chilly reception from the audience. Most of those series already are headed for the ashcan.

And what about last fall's crop of 20 new sitcoms? Only ABC's "Dharma & Greg" premiered with a hearty buzz and healthy ratings, thanks mostly to its vivacious star Jenna Elfman.

"Dharma" next fall will join "The Wonderful World of Disney" (whose original version goes back to Eisenhower's first term) as likely the sole survivors among the 11 series ABC launched at the beginning of this season.

Meanwhile, CBS conceivably could log 0-for-7 renewals of last fall's new fare. But besides "Four Corners," that network has since introduced another midseason entry, a sitcom starring Tom Selleck as an adman. As a bit, "The Closer" isn't even close. Selleck's very successful former series premiered in the final weeks of the Carter administration.

Remember Carter's 1979 speech about the national malaise? It could apply to network TV these days: to the warmed-over feel of most new shows, and to the viewers who reject them. This has been a season whose most gripping prime-time drama and most perversely funny comedy has been NBC struggling for dear life to hang onto its hits from a more inspired past.

For instance, threatened with losing "ER" to another network next fall, NBC kept those gurney pushers on its schedule by agreeing to hike the "ER" licensing fee to an estimated $15 million per episode. Then, last week, the network handed "Mad About You" stars Paul Reiser and Helen Hunt lots more "Mad" money to come back for one last season.

some guy in a theater. Sure, it may have sold 15 million copies worldwide, but the artistic merit of Jagged Little Pill is dubious at best. She didn't even write much of the album's lyrical content, hiring a man — Glen Ballard — to co-write the material. Fifteen million record-buyers can, and usually are, wrong.

It a damn shame that music so often has to be watered down for mass consumption by the mainstream. To me at least, its an abhorrence to hear people talk about Alanis as being this great voice for women when she's merely a mouthpiece for some middle-aged guy's words.

If you want to get a sense of the other-worldly energy and theatricality, try PJ Harvey's To Bring You My Love. If you want to hear prose that's infinitely more elegant and moving than "is she perverted like me?" pick up a copy of Patti Smith's Horses.

Still, this flurry of attention has helped things in many respects. One of the positives of Alanis' crossover success has been to pique the ears of music fan's everywhere to take notice of the artistic merits of women. The music has always been there, but recently critical acclaim and recognition has come along with it.

Hope for the future:

The last several years have consistently seen women release the lion's share of memorable albums. Works by Harvey, Melissa Etheridge, Indigo Girls, Björk, Missy "Misdemeanor" Elliot and Hole have all topped recent year- end "Best Of" lists and, more importantly, have brought artistically credible portraits of strong-willed, innovative women to the fore of a music scene that has become stale. Even the Grammy's have taken notice, nominating Paula Cole seven times this year and handing Alanis gramophones for Album of the Year and Record of the Year (at least the sentiment was nice).

With the last year giving us the wildly successful Lilith Fair package tour and strong releases from newcomers like Meredith Brooks and Beth Orton — whose ace debut, Trailer Park, was criminally overlooked — the future looks bright indeed.

After appearing on "Saturday Night Live" on March 7, Natalie Imbruglia's Left of the Middle entered on the Billboard Top 200 Album Chart at No. 10 — the highest debut for a new Alternative Pop-Rock female artist, selling more in its first week than Morissette, Meredith Brooks and Fiona Apple combined. With a cover story in the June issue of Spin and an exhaustive summer tour schedule, the sky's the limit.

Providence College to hire Iona's Welsh as head coach

By Terrence Petty
Associated Press

PROVIDENCE, R.I. — Tim Welsh, who coached Iona to a spot in the NCAA tournament after a 13-year absence, will be hired as coach at Providence College, The Associated Press learned yesterday.

Sources close to the negotiations said the announcement could come today. Jeff Ruland, a former Iona star and current assistant at the school, would then be hired as coach of the Gaels. Welsh, who led Iona to a 27-6 record this season that included a 15-game winning streak, will replace Pete Gillen, who left to coach Virginia.

Welsh, 37, takes a big step in moving from the Metro Atlantic Athletic Conference to the Big East Conference and will inherit a team that went 13-16.

Welsh met with Providence officials on Monday, the Providence Journal-Bulletin reported.

"We have no comment until a deal is done," Providence spokesman Tim Connor said.

The New York Post and the New York Daily News said Welsh agreed to a six-year deal with Providence.

"I've been contacted by Providence about the job," Welsh told the Post on Tuesday night. But, he added, "I can't say anything at this time."

Two days earlier, Welsh said he "always thought that Providence was one of the great places in college basketball, so I would be interested if they called."

Welsh is 70-22 in three seasons at Iona. He took over the Gaels in 1994-95 when his father, Jerry, then head coach, became ill. Gillen's departure marked the fifth time in a dozen years that Providence had to go looking for a new coach.

Gillen has a career record of 274-128 in 13 seasons, the last four at Providence, where he guided the Friars to a 24-12 record in 1997. That season ended with a loss to eventual national champion Arizona in the regional final.

Under Gillen, Providence had a 72-53 record. Some Providence players have expressed bitterness that he left.

But at a Tuesday night awards ceremony attended by Gillen, players thanked their former coach and at least one of them wept.

Boxer Patterson resigns NY post

By John Kekis
Associated Press

Floyd Patterson resigned yesterday as New York's athletic commissioner amid reports he was suffering from memory loss so severe that he couldn't remember his secretary's name or even the foe he beat for his first heavyweight title.

"After long and careful consideration, my family and I have decided that for personal reasons, I will resign," Patterson wrote in a brief letter to Gov. George Pataki. "I am grateful for the opportunity you gave me to serve the people of New York and the boxing community."

Many former boxers — from Sugar Ray Robinson to Muhammad Ali — have suffered from various forms of brain injuries or illnesses, or memory loss.

A damaging report in yesterday's New York Post may have precipitated Patterson's resignation as head of the body that regulates professional boxing and wrestling. It said a 3 1/2-hour videotape of a deposition Patterson gave two weeks ago shows that he was unable to recall important events in his 64-fight professional career or the names of his closest aides.

The 63-year-old Patterson was asked dozens of questions under oath March 20 for a suit filed by promoters of "ultimate fighting," a no-holds-barred sport that is banned in New York. He could not recall that he beat Archie Moore in 1956 to win the heavyweight championship, nor that the fight was in Chicago.

Patterson said he thought the bout was in New York. He also said he thought title fights were still 15 rounds instead of the current 12.

On the videotape, Patterson did not know the name of the man he replaced as commissioner, Randy "Macho" Gordon. And when he was given the name of his secretary and then asked who it was, he recognized her name but did not know what her job was.

"I didn't get much sleep last night and I'm very, very tired," Patterson said during the deposition. "It's hard for me to think when I'm tired. Sometimes, I can't even remember my wife's name, and I've been married 32 — 33 years."

Attempts to reach Patterson for comment at his home in New Paltz, N.Y., were unsuccessful. Messages left on his answering machine were not returned.

Patterson, who earns $76,421, was to serve as commissioner until the end of the year.

Rumors have been circulating that Patterson suffers from problems with short- and long-term memory. Former light heavyweight champion Jose Torres, a longtime friend of Patterson, had heard those rumors.

"I felt that he was having a little trouble with his memory, and people were talking about it all around boxing," Torres said. "But I have been in a couple of programs with him and he has been pretty sharp. If he had problems, maybe he had problems sometimes. I assume that he has ups and downs. If he was caught on one of those days that he doesn't remember, then he's in trouble."

Patterson, who grew up in Brooklyn and won a gold medal in the 1956 Summer Olympics, was picked by Pataki to be commissioner because of his name and reputation to rebuild boxing in New York, once a mecca for the sport.

Since Patterson took over, the number of boxing shows has doubled and big events have returned to Madison Square Garden, including title bouts featuring Oscar de la Hoya and Roy Jones.

But two years ago, Patterson made headlines when he was quoted as saying he had just heard of AIDS. As commissioner, Patterson had announced that New York would begin testing boxers for the AIDS virus in response to boxer Tommy Morrison's positive HIV test. When asked why the state waited so long to institute the testing, Patterson replied: "AIDS just came out. I go back to the '50s. I fought for 23 years. There was no AIDS. I just heard of AIDS a few weeks ago."

Patterson claimed that his comments were misinterpreted. If he has a physical problem that would cause memory loss, doctors and numerous tests so far have been unable to find one, according to a source close to the situation who spoke on condition of anonymity.

Patterson's letter to Pataki did not mention his memory loss, and commission spokeswoman Gwen Lee said Patterson had been considering his resignation for some time.

A year later, Woods to return to Augusta

By Ron Sirak
Associated Press

AUGUSTA, Ga. — Even before Tiger Woods finished his 12-stroke victory at the Masters the cry was echoing through the towering Georgia pines to "Tigerize" Augusta National Golf Club. Grow rough, was a suggestion. Stick fairway bunkers all over the place to swallow up tee shots. Lengthen the par-5 holes.

Hide Tiger's driver.

Woods so completely dominated the diabolical old course in shooting 18-under-par, it seemed something had to be done to keep him from winning the Masters every year until he lost interest. But as Woods returns to the scene of one of the most overwhelming performances in major championship golf, the response of the men in green jackets who run Augusta National has been very much in character.

They've done virtually nothing.

"There are always ongoing discussions regarding possible changes to our golf course. However, we would never make any changes because of one player or one tournament," said Augusta National chairman Jack Stephens.

There were some tweaks to the course over the last year. Three greens — Nos. 6, 8 and 14 — were recontoured slightly to give more options for pin positions.

A tall pine that protected the right side of the 11th fairway fell down a few years ago so the tee was moved 20 feet to the right to make the drive more demanding.

Trees were planted on the right side of the dogleg on No. 13 and on the right side of No. 18 to narrow the bailout areas on those holes.

But the basic attitude of the men in charge is that Augusta National is a masterpiece, and that while the Mona Lisa may require restoration work now and then, you don't draw a mustache on it.

"In fact, last year's scoring was the highest it had been in the last eight tournaments, and higher than when Jack Nicklaus set the record in 1965, and Raymond Floyd tied it in 1976," Stephens said.

"All changes are the result of long-range planning."

In many ways, the call to radically alter Augusta underestimates what Woods accomplished last year. A great golfer played 3 1/2 rounds of near perfect golf.

It was Bill Walton shooting 21-of-22 in the NCAA championship game. It was Bob Beamon's record long jump in the 1968 Olympics that lasted 23 years.

It was the kind of performance that comes along only once in a lifetime. There is only one flaw in that reasoning — Tiger Woods. He just might be capable of more than one once-in-a-lifetime performance.

Jack Nicklaus thinks so. So does Woods' coach, Butch Harmon, who says his student might go into the 50s someday at Augusta. A little more than 30 years ago several changes were made to Augusta after a long hitter won the tournament in 1963 and 1965-66.

"They changed the golf course in the mid-1960s because of me," Nicklaus said. "I won the tournament three out of four years. They put in bunkers and tried to restrict where I could hit the ball. Now those bunkers are obsolete."

Nicklaus, who won a record six Masters, thinks Augusta fits Woods' game as well as it fit his own and predicted Woods could win the tournaments 10 times.

"I felt if I played well I would really have to have some bad breaks to lose at Augusta," Nicklaus said. "With my length, the hazards weren't there. I hit it over everything, same as he does. I see no reason why he won't do it again."

Nicklaus opposes growing rough to make courses more difficult, saying it takes away from the beauty of the recovery shot. He advocates pro golf rolling back by 10 or 20 percent how far the golf ball will go.

Shaun Barnes drew a walk from Skirkanich. Freshman Tony Fiumfreddo then connected for a single to right. When Samela tried to catch Fiumfreddo, who was leading off first, Lang misplayed the ball, allowing Barnes to reach third. Fiumfreddo stole second on the next play.

That put Siena's hopes on the bat of Bill Cliento, who drove a grounder to third, but Wolcott made the play to nab Cliento at first.

The bottom of the second provided UMass' scoring opportunity, and Siena could not muster any firepower in the top of the third.

The game was called in the bottom of the third, with Mazzaferro on third and Clark on first. Gautreau was at the plate.

KEN MCDONALD / COLLEGIAN

The UMass baseball team was only able to get a few plays in before the rain washed away the team's home opener was a solid dizzle. That turned into a solid shower soon after.

The rain made conditions miserable for the fans early on, but the storm did not wash the mustard off of attack Laura Koruts's shot, as she cut cleanly into a gaping hole in the center of the Bears' defense and sizzled the ball past Brown goaltender Becky Tavani six minutes later for her second goal of the young first half, giving the Minutewomen a one score lead.

In fact, the heavier the UMass offensive pressure got, the heavier the precipitation seemed to get. As midfielder Noelle Gorski put Massachusetts up by a score of 3–1 a few minutes later, the shower had progressed into a torrential downpour.

While senior tri-captain Jennifer Bowen and her teammates adjusted well to the conditions, taking their time on offense and waiting patiently for plays to develop around the opposing cage, the Bears seemed to clutch onto a speed game, which hindered their attack at the beginning of the storm. Gorski and freshman Rachel Ingraffea provided timely bursts of energy to break up the opposing defense.

On defense, sophomore Jessica Passanese and senior tri- captain Amy Leder lead an impressively strong effort against a hungry Brown team. Freshman Tara Durkin, in her first start at Massachusetts, made several key saves; 15 over the course of the game.

"I thought we played really nice defense, and that's an understatement," McClellan said. "I think the first half went amazing. In the second half the mud was a little bit more of a factor, but there weren't many mistakes."

THANG VU / COLLEGIAN

Mandy Galas and the UMass softball team travel to Hartford today for a doubleheader.

Two Brown scores and roughly 17 minutes later, after what became a much slower paced, defensive matchup, midfielder Stephanie Pavlick scored to push the Minutewomen ahead with about a minute and a half to go in the first half. The lead was short lived, however, as Elizabeth Rodgers snuck a goal by Durkin to tie the game at four going into halftime.

Much like the beginning first period, Massachusetts got on the board with great frequency to start the second half. The Minutewomen managed three unanswered scores out the gates to gain a commanding 7–4 advantage.

Again, like the first half, the tide slowly turned back to the opposition, as a few small lapses on the part of UMass allowed Brown to creep back into the game. A goal by Rodgers brought the Bears to within one score, at 7–6.

"The rain evened things out," McClellan said. "They had their share of slips in bad times and we had our share of slips in bad times."

Leder and freshman midfielder Denise Brey then became the backbone of a late game defensive standoff in which the Minutewomen hung on to their one goal advantage for 12 minutes, trying to avoid overtime. That stand came to a disheartening end as Amanda Hatton postponed Brown's eventual loss with a score at the 1:08 mark.

After a scoreless first overtime, Pavlick flicked in the game winner 1:01 into the second one, inciting a sudden explosion of emotional jubilation, as the Minutewomen brought their record to 3–2 over a difficult five-game opening schedule.

clean that up. Our connecting through the midfield in the first half, before it got messy, was just beautiful."

The Minutewomen downed the Ivy Leaguers as they battled downpours and unsure footing to finally snuff out any Brown hopes of another win this year. After the Bears tied the score at 7–7, with less than a minute remaining in regulation, UMass simply refused to let any more opposing players past its defensive wall.

It was more than just defense, however, as the often times the midfielders and attack line made the defenders' jobs a little bit easier by simply outhustling the Brown players, and getting to the ball quickly.

"That's something we've worked on recently. Up to this point we fouled on a lot of ground balls and loose balls," McClellan said. "I thought we did some really nice things with the loose balls."

The Minutewomen expected those things to be among the keys to winning along with drop sessions, which they also controlled several times. It seemed, however, that this game was going to be close no matter what. The elements had only heightened the drama and once again, UMass did not disappoint.

"The Harvard game was the best opening game we could have had, because the experience of pulling it out and getting to this situation knowing we could pull it out," McClellan said. "It was just, really, faith in doing our jobs and the kids did that. I can't ask for a better scenario with a really young group of players. It was really heartening."

Next up for the Minutewomen will be an away date with UConn in Storrs, Conn. Game time is scheduled for Saturday at 1 p.m.

Minutewomen Notes: UMass' game against New Hampshire which was originally scheduled for March 21 and cancelled because of inclement weather conditions has been rescheduled for April 26 in Durham, N.H. at 3 p.m.

young and inexperienced team to the field.

The team consists of just one senior, four juniors, three sophomores, and six freshman. While Randall has brought a stronger offensive team to the plate this year, the Hawks' pitching staff has been struggling.

"Our pitching is an area of some concern," Randall said in a pre-season interview. "The people to whom we will be handing the ball are relatively unproven at this level. The challenge is in front of them as they need to step up."

Junior right–hander and co–captain Sue Dvorak has been Hartford's go–to pitcher so far this season. She has started eight games, winning three and losing five. She currently holds an ERA of 3.92, and is the only returning pitcher the Hawks have. Backing her up are Marci Simoneau, a freshman with a 3.50 ERA, and Johanna Boiselle, a sophomore transfer with an ERA of 3.74.

With no real power pitcher on the mounds, the Hawks have to count on their defense to be solid each and every game. Handling the responsibility in the infield is a very young squad, one featuring three freshman and one junior. Junior transfer Dana Kennett is the strong spot for Hartford. A two–time junior college All–American, she anchors the shortstop position. Freshman Meghan Henning, Tiffany Bryant and Simoneau are cutting their teeth at first, second and third base respectively.

In the outfield Hartford relies on the play of junior center fielder Tammy Jaworowski. Jaworowski leads the Hawks in offensive production as well. She holds the team's highest batting average at .273.

The Hawks will need all the offensive production they can get when they face off against UMass' Danielle Henderson. Henderson, a junior named to last year's third team All–America, is coming off of a weekend where she threw her first perfect game and was named the Atlantic–10 pitcher of the week.

"She has become more consistent in her workout. She has really worked on finishing when she's down in the count," Sortino said. "She has become more comfortable on the mound. She's doing what you would expect of her, and becoming more consistent at it."

Lacrosse club claims hard fought win

Although the scouting report the UMass club lacrosse team received in preparation for its game against the Army junior varsity squad seemed intimidating — "Attackmen no strong the Army coaches let them freelance" — UMass went into the game determined.

What resulted from the contest at West Point, N.Y. was an impressive 9–5 win in the visitors' favor.

Perhaps the key to the game was the work of UMass' defensive corps, which held Army scoreless for the first and third quarters. Tom Schauweker, Erik Becker, Juan–Pablo Mas, Patrice Bernadel, Chris Paulson and Mike Haidak assumed the task of close defense, while UMass received strong goaltending from Mike Nowlan (five saves) and Phus Thai (eight saves).

The host team also had to contend with the work of Tim Mooney, Chris Murray, Mike Dyer, Eric Hansen, Greg Ramsey, Roberto Torres and Chuck Lavers in the midfield. All combined to push UMass' transition game.

Unfortunately for Army, UMass' Brendan Keenan was virtually unstoppable. He eluded his defenders to pick up five key groundballs and tally two goals and two assists.

Owen Poland and Levence Eutsay each contributed two goals and an assist, while face–off man Stephen Vutrano, Kevin Murray and Gabe Martz had one score apiece.

Horoscopes

ARIES (March 21–April 19) — You are going to want to keep a detailed record of your thoughts, actions and expenditures at this time. Later, the info will be useful.

TAURUS (April 20–May 20) — You may fail at something today which will become routinely easy for you in the near future. Indeed, you may come to be an expert!

GEMINI (May 21–June 20) — You may not be able to do everything on the docket within the time allowed today, so you must be sure to prioritize. Do not lose focus.

CANCER (June 21–July 22) — Someone close to you may try to take advantage of your natural tendency toward tolerance and understanding today. You may have to say no!

LEO (July 23–Aug. 22) — You can play a larger role than expected in someone else's affairs today, but the decision you have to make is simple: Would it do you any good at all?

VIRGO (Aug. 23–Sept. 22) — Today, you may come to one or two conclusions which may be unpopular in the long run. Still, you have to be true to yourself.

LIBRA (Sept. 23–Oct. 22) — Take time out today to assess your progress in recent weeks. You may have been sidetracked recently; get back on course!

SCORPIO (Oct. 23–Nov. 21) — This is a good day to begin putting plans in motion. Someone may be trying to complicate matters; don't let him or her get you down.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22–Dec. 21) — You may be doing something today for entirely the wrong reasons — but the gains everyone enjoys as a result make the motive forgivable.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22–Jan. 19) — You may find yourself racing against the clock throughout much of the day. Remember that you mustn't get sloppy in any way.

AQUARIUS (Jan 20.–Feb. 18) — There is too much for you to tend to on your own today. You are going to have to get help- it's only a matter of asking for it.

PISCES (Feb 19–March 20) — See if you can't adopt someone else's approach to a problem today. Your way is only doing you so much good; a new way can only improve matters.

Nature pulls plug on baseball's home debut

UM led 1–0 before delay

By Casey Kane
Collegian Staff

Mother Nature couldn't hold off her attack any longer, and the Massachusetts baseball team payed the price.

With the Minutemen holding a 1–0 lead in the bottom of the third in UMass' home opener against Siena, the teams retired to their dugouts. After a 27–minute rain delay, the game was called on account of the weather.

The Minutemen had scored the only run of the day before the rain began. Right fielder Pete Gautreau scored on a fielder's choice from third baseman Matt Wolcott in the bottom of the second inning.

Gautreau reached base on a double to the gap in right center. He moved to third on catcher Brian Samela's single to left field. Aaron Braunstein walked to load the bases, setting up Wolcott's at bat.

Nick Skirkanich made an abbreviated home debut, giving up two hits in three innings of work.

In the top of the first, Tim Breault reached base on a Wolcott error, but Nick Spera lined to UMass' Nick Lang at first, who doubled up Breault on the play. Dave Merek flew out to center field to end that half of the inning.

In the first half inning of UMass' home debut, Shaun Skeffington started things with a single. Shortstop Bryan Mazzaferro ripped another single to push Skeffington to third. But Muchie Dagliere lined out to Siena's shortstop, who doubled up Mazzaferro at second base. Doug Clark flew out to left to end the inning.

The second inning gave Siena its best chance to plate a run early. After the first two Saint batters flew out,

Rain doesn't stop UM lax attack

By Seth Koenig
Collegian Staff

"It rained and rained. There was light rain, heavy rain and rain that was kind of in between. There was rain that came down, rain that went sideways, and even rain that seemed like it was coming straight up."

Forrest Gump probably would have described the Massachusetts women's lacrosse team's 8–7 double overtime victory against Brown this way, and he would have been dead on.

"I knew it would start sometime around game-time," UMass coach Francesca McClellan said. "Because it didn't start long before the game, our field was actually pretty good. Had it started any earlier, we would have been in tough shape."

When the Bears' senior attack Allison Schettini scored the game's first goal at the 27:52 mark, there

Women's lacrosse hitting on all cylinders in Brown win

By Jamie Jee

Out of the rain, the mud, and the confusion came the Massachusetts women's lacrosse team. With it, an 8–7 double overtime victory over Brown University, a team many players remembered well.

Those recollections were not very pleasant though, as UMass (3–2) could still recall the rude farewell dealt to them by the Bears (1–4, 0–1 Ivy League) last year in a 16–5 season finale loss.

This year would be different though. This was a new season, a new team; and with yesterday's sloppy win, a new beginning.

Improvement has been paramount for such a young team and this season the Minutewomen have already shown, if nothing else, that they can win the close ones. By season's end they hope to have even more to show for their teamwork.

Not even Mother Nature could stop the UMass progress train as it rumbled on, taking a few goals on the grill along the way. There was slipping, there was sliding, but in the end it only seemed all for nought to the visitors. Despite the bad conditions and a wet ball, the team still managed to remain sharp.

"We did a much better job catching than we did against Temple," Massachusetts coach Francesca McClellan said. "That was one of our issues with Temple. Our kids were jittery. I think we came out the last couple of days in practice very focused to

Softball faces Hartford, looks to continue streak

By Jackie Leroux

After starting the season 1–7, the Massachusetts women's softball team used the month of March to improve its record. The Minutewomen went 14–3 in the month and are currently on a seven–game winning streak.

Today they will try to continue their winning ways when they travel to the University of Hartford to take on the Hawks at 3 p.m.

Coach Elaine Sortino credits UMass' slow start to the lack of outdoor practice. The majority of the team's opponents so far this season have been Southern schools. Since those schools are in a warmer region, they can begin practicing outdoors as soon as the season begins. UMass on the other hand has been forced to practice in the dim confines of the Boyden Gymnasium.

"Our schedule is very, very difficult early on," Sortino said. "People ask us why we go out there and get our brains blown out, and it's because we have to play these kind of people. We don't start with a level playing field, so we have to play excellent, while our opponents just have to be good."

The Minutewomen will be taking on a Hartford team that has struggled so far this season. After losing two straight games to Cornell the Hawks now stand at 5–10–1. Coach Todd Randall, in his second season at the head coaching position, brings a very

Russian space officials curb media coverage

MOSCOW (AP) — Journalists will no longer be allowed to listen in on conversations between Russian Mission Control and cosmonauts on the Mir space station, officials said yesterday.

The shift in policy came after a seven-hour spacewalk on Wednesday failed to accomplish repairs to the outside of Mir. Reporters at Russia's Mission Control were able to hear occasional fragments of radio traffic between ground controllers and cosmonauts Talgat Musabayev and Nikolai Budarin during the Wednesday spacewalk.

But for most of it, the audio system was intentionally turned off and reporters had to wait for space officials to provide periodic briefings.

The mission ended in disappointment as the crew ran out of time and failed to stabilize a badly bent solar panel, leaving the task for the next spacewalk, set for Monday.

When asked why the sound system was turned off, officials said it reflected a recent decision to keep reporters from listening in. Pressed further, Deputy Mission Control chief Viktor Blagov cited problems with "unconscientious" journalists who allegedly exaggerated some of the Mir's past problems.

Reynolds pulls out of proposed settlement

WASHINGTON (AP) — R.J. Reynolds Tobacco Co. is pulling out of the proposed tobacco settlement that already has earned three states billions of dollars, dismayed by Congress' attempt to approve a much tougher version, a lawyer said yesterday.

The practical effect of RJR's move, expected to be formally announced today in Washington, is that the company would fight in court any restrictions on their industry that Congress passes.

"They're doing it because this [legislation] as written kills them," said John Coale, a Washington-based anti-tobacco attorney who said tobacco industry officials had informed him of the pending move.

It also means no other states beyond Mississippi, Florida and Texas would be in line to settle pending lawsuits with RJR, Coale said.

RJR did not immediately return phone calls requesting comment. Such a move by a tobacco company was long expected, and the leading congressional Republican on the issue dismissed RJR's threat yesterday.

"I don't think that it matters," said Sen. John McCain, (R-Ariz.), chairman of the Senate Commerce Committee. "They've been saying all along that they couldn't support this bill. I expected a negative reaction from the tobacco industry. So if one tobacco company can't go along, then I'm sorry."

Judiciary debates election violations

JOHN BURT / COLLEGIAN

Jesse Burchfield shows the panel of judges evidence on video tape at the student judiciary hearing last night.

By Jill Carroll
Collegian Staff

A verdict on petitions filed concerning University of Massachusetts Student Government Association (SGA) elections that will decide the ratification or nullification of the elections was not decided at the time of print by the student judiciary in a meeting last night.

The petitions filed are complaints of unconstitutional processes in the elections. By finding a petition true the elections would be found unconstitutional and would be nullified.

The first petition debated was from Attorney General and former presidential candidate, Jesse Burchfield and Senator and former student trustee candidate, Brenda Fitzpatrick (Commuter at–large). Several election practices were cited as unconstitutional in the petition.

The main complaint however was that absentee ballots were not available at all polling places. It is in the constitution that absentee ballots must be at polling places.

Elections Commissioner Sandra Brookley said as a witness that her polling place was the only one with absentee ballots.

"My station was the only one that allowed absentee ballots to be taken," Brookley said.

Election Commissioner Melissa Haskell also testified to not having absentee ballots at her polling place.

"No I did not provide them [absentee ballots]," Haskell said.

Former trustee candidate and Student Representative to the Board of Higher Education, Eleanor Court also testified that absentee ballots were not provided.

"Students were not allowed to vote with absentee ballots," Court said.

Burchfield spoke of the significance of the violations.

"Each one of these is enough to change the elections. What we have is substantial violations," Burchfield said.

However Ed Cutting, advocating on behalf of former Chancellor of Elections Carlos Alvarez said these errors did not affect the election results.

"You have a harmless error that doesn't hurt any individual candidate. They [elections commissioners who manned the polling places] screwed up but they were impartial."

Brookley testified to witnessing other violations.

"I know for certain that when [students] tried to write in they were told by the commissioner they could not

JSU makes plans for future

By Bryan Schwartzman

New leaders for the Jewish Student Executive Board were elected Wednesday night. Approximately 40 students in the Jewish Student Union (JSU) turned out in the Hillel House to cast their vote.

The Executive Board consists of the President and several vice presidents who co-ordinate the different branches of the Registered Student Organization and work closely with the larger JSU Council to plan events and set agendas.

The election process required candidates to submit a letter of intent the previous week, and allowed for the possibility for candidates to drop down and run for a lower position pending defeat, and allowed for nominations on the spot. Candidates were allowed four minutes to speak and then the audience was allowed two questions.

Rachel Kristol was elected president in a race contested with Arielle Weintraub, former vice president of administration. Kristol said she wants to attract more members by holding more social events. Kristol said she does not want people to associate the Jewish Student Union with religious matters, but be a place where people can meet others.

Kristol said the most important goals for the remainder of the semester are planning for Holocaust Commemoration Week and Israeli Independence Day.

Weintraub exercised the drop down option and ran against Daniel Friedman for vice–president of administration. Friedman won the election and attempted to redefine the various positions in his platform speech. Friedman said one of his main concerns is public advocacy; he wants to create an ex–officio seat in the SGA Senate in order to ensure Jewish issues are addressed.

Shira Hutt, who was elected vice–president of religious and cultural affairs, said she wants "to bring more Jewish awareness to campus."

She described her position as an overseer to various committees, while

Faculty Senate to discuss progress of Vision 2000

By Victoria Groves
Collegian Staff

At next week's Faculty Senate meeting at the University of Massachusetts, Vision 2000 reports will be presented by various councils and a general discussion will take place on how the proposal will move ahead.

Vision 2000 was first submitted in the spring of 1997 and is a proposal made to the Presidents and Chancellor of the New England Land Grant Universities to ensure full and equitable participation by women faculty, staff and students in these sites. In short, to include women more fully in the workings of the university by ending gender–bias and discrimination, and promoting family–friendly initiatives, among others.

Faculty senates at each of the six institutions were asked to discuss and endorse the proposal.

"Vision 2000 is asking the university to look at a number of issues, whether there are salary equity issues. If we do have salary inequities, then there needs to be steps taken to rectify these concerns," said Carol Wallace, director of the Everywoman's Center and committee member.

According to Wallace, the committees that have been heard from so far have been very supportive, and at least two have produced motions in support of the proposal.

In some areas, the university is doing exceedingly well. Title 9, which consists of legislation requiring equal access for women in athletics, has been addressed adequately by the university.

"We're doing well with Title 9... There are other places where we just don't know how we are doing, and where there is definite room for improvement," Wallace said.

This would be an all encompassing document for all six New England land grant institutions, including the University of Connecticut and the University of New Hampshire.

Committee chair Ann Ferguson was not available for comment.

Hillel teaches Jewish tradition and history through art

By Morgan Tobor
Collegian Correspondent

When students first enter the Kosher Dining Commons at the Hillel House at University of Massachusetts, their eyes will feast on an array of color design provided by an award– winning mural.

According to Rabbi Saul Perlmutter, this prized mural stretches 70–feet across, furnishing the commons with a lively colorful backdrop.

The mural, though untitled, received the Eli Wiesel Award for the Jewish Arts and culture by National Hillel.

Under the instruction of Northampton's local artist Jonathan Kohrman, 17 students painted the mural last Spring, which links text with Jewish imagery that mirrors the different time periods throughout Jewish antiquity.

The Hillel house offers a series of one credit courses; one of which is mural making with emphasis in Jewish traditions and history.

The class is a Hillel–sponsored Judaic studies course, Perlmutter said. There is no religious or artistic prerequisite for the class, however diversity is encouraged, Kohrman said.

Senior Liz S. Gordon, a political science major, registered for the class with the initial intent of contributing her prior knowledge of mural making, a skill she cultivated during her experiences decorating her local temple back home.

"I left this feeling I was able to make a contribution but received so much more in return — an understanding of Jewish art history, as well as a broader sense of Jewish painters, while at the same time enhancing my individual production techniques," Gordon said.

The Hillel House will be offering the Judaic Studies 192W course again next fall for students interested in working with a professional artist, in a hands–on atmosphere.

Students can sign up during pre–registration and should contact the Hillel House at 549–1710, or e–mail umhillel@oitunix.umass.edu for more information.

Greek Hellenic Society re–established on UM campus

By Jason Trenkle
Collegian Staff

University of Massachusetts students like Gregory Essopos and Alexandra Bitzas are just a few of the many Greek students here on campus who are making a big effort to contribute to the first successful Greek Hellenic Society here on campus.

In the past, a Greek Hellenic Society was started, but due to lack of organization efforts and funding, the society became inactive. As a new addition to the RSOs last semester, the society was re–started in joint efforts to bring the Greek community back together at the University. With a strong connection to his Greek heritage, Essopos seeks to find individuals on campus that want to be a part of the Greek community.

"We have a very strong background in family heritage and a long tradition of ethnic pride," Essopos said. "This, along with religion, has played a big role in bringing us together."

This semester, the RSO has been planning and is interested in working with different churches to help contribute to the benefits of the surrounding community.

"We want to get our names and our ideas out to the campus and to let perspective students know that there's an opportunity to get involved with and be a part of the Greek communities," Essopos said.

This past weekend, the Hellenic Society traveled to Boston and took part in the annual Greek Independence Day parade. Donations from the surrounding community and from the SGA helped make it possible for the RSO to participate in Boston. By taking place in the Greek parade, the society not only interacted with other groups of the same culture, but were also able to let people from Boston and all over Massachusetts know that the university has grown to now include a Greek society.

Since the beginning of the year, the society has increased from 10 members to now more than 50, a quarter of whom are natives of Greece. In the future, the Hellenic Society hopes to increase the number of its members and to encourage the UMass campus to become involved. Already, they have exuded success as an RSO that had once fallen. "Our main purpose is to bring together all students of Greek descent, with the purpose of getting to know each other and to form an exclusive Greek community active on campus and in the surrounding communities," Essopos said.

Jonesboro killers possessed powerful, semiautomatic rifles & more in arsenal

By Farrell Kramer
Associated Press

JONESBORO, Ark. — At 100 yards, their seven handguns wouldn't be terribly effective. Too hard to hit their moving targets.

But the two boys at the center of the Jonesboro schoolyard massacre, no strangers to firearms, had other options at hand, officials say. Evidence indicates most of the bullets that felled 15 classmates and teachers, killing five of them, were fired from two powerful rifles, stolen from the younger boy's grandfather the morning of the attack.

Fifteen shots came from a replica of the M-1 carbine, a famous weapon carried by U.S. troops in World War II, Korea and Vietnam. Five more were fired from a Remington .30-06 hunting rifle, able to take down a 200-pound deer with a single shot from a quarter mile away.

Both are semiautomatic; the only limit on firing speed is how fast a shooter can pull the trigger, which ejects the spent shell and chambers a new one in an instant.

Adelman finishes study with siyum at Chabad House

Rabbi's study focused on Mishnah Torah

By Elana Premack
Collegian Staff

Celebrating the completion of Rabbi Chaim Adelman's three-year study of the Mishnah Torah composed by Rabbi Moses Maimonides, a "siyum" was held at Chabad House on Tuesday night.

The siyum, a custom of celebrating the completion of a great Jewish work, was attended by students and other members of the University of Massachusetts community, along with several of Adelman's family members.

Adelman's daughter Channie brought a historical perspective to her father's celebration by providing those gathered with background information on Maimonides and the Mishnah Torah.

Maimonides, recognized as a great Jewish scholar, began commenting on the Mishnah, or Torah commentary, at the age of 23. Within 10 years he began writing the Mishnah Torah, drawing from the Talmud, considered in Jewish tradition as the word of God, and the Mishnah. Maimonides' entire work is composed of 14 books, containing over 1000 chapters, and is a compilation of Jewish law.

"He compiled the entire breadth and width of Jewish law in his day," Adelman said.

Adelman's accomplishment is unique — he was able to complete the study of what he called a "monumental work" in three years. Adelman has completed the study five times since the Lubavitcher Rebbe, Rabbi Menachem Mendel Schneerson, initiated it 15 years ago.

"It is a lifetime proposition for Jews to study the entire Torah," Adelman said. "The closest we can get to studying the entire Torah is by studying the Rambam [the Mishnah Torah]."

Adelman chose to study one chapter per day, privately.

"The Mishnah Torah touches on every aspect of Jewish life," Adelman said. "It was illuminating."

During the celebration on Tuesday night, Adelman shared his experience and gave insights into what the Mishnah Torah includes.

"The world's continuity in existence is dependent on the Torah," Adelman said. "Once the Torah was given on Mount Sinai, the world was given certainty."

The chapters that Adelman presented concentrated on the certainties of the world and the belief in Judaism of the coming of the Messiah.

"The poignancy of Maimonides' work is that there is more than just faith," Adelman said.

The Mishnah Torah stresses the active participation of the Jewish people in hastening the coming of the Messiah.

The work also includes the 13 principles of faith. Adelman gave all in attendance a copy of the 13 principles and, in keeping with the theme of celebrating Jewish tradition, a dollar bill for tzedakah, the Jewish custom of donating to charity.

Witnesses allegedly paid

WASHINGTON — The tables could be turned on Whitewater investigators — they may be investigated themselves.

Attorney General Janet Reno yesterday said accounts that Whitewater witness David Hale received financial assistance from conservative activists while he was cooperating with independent counsel Kenneth Starr "must be pursued."

"I think it must be pursued and I want to make a determination as to how it should be pursued," Reno said at her weekly news conference.

Reno is considering whether the allegations should be investigated by the Justice Department's Office of Professional Responsibility, by Starr, who has authority to probe obstruction of his investigation, or by the federal judge in Arkansas who heard Hale's testimony in the Whitewater case, said a Justice Department official who requested anonymity.

A spokeswoman for Starr could not immediately be reached for comment.

Hale's testimony before U.S. District Judge George Howard in Little Rock, Ark., helped convict President Clinton's former business partners and Arkansas' sitting governor.

First family applauds Jones ruling

By John Solomon
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Buoyed by his legal victory, President Clinton declared yesterday from Africa that he was "very much looking forward" to a homecoming absent the Paula Jones' trial.

Prosecutors tempered White House euphoria by questioning the president's chief of staff before a grand jury.

Mrs. Jones' lawyers said they were "99 percent" certain they would appeal the dismissal of her sexual harassment lawsuit. But for the time being, the ruling by a federal judge in Little Rock, Ark., left the White House focused in a single direction — Independent Counsel Kenneth Starr and his investigation into the Monica Lewinsky matter.

That investigation, an outgrowth of the Jones lawsuit, is to determine if Clinton had sexual relations with Ms. Lewinsky, a White House intern, and tried to cover it up from Mrs. Jones' lawyers.

With the political climate around him markedly changed, Starr said he recognized "a very keen and powerful interest" in quickly wrapping up his investigation but declared he would not be derailed by the Jones dismissal.

"If you lie under oath, if you intimidate a witness, if you seek otherwise to obstruct the process of justice, it doesn't matter who wins and loses in the civil case," the prosecutor said. Mrs. Jones drove off wordlessly from her Long Beach, Calif., condominium before noon yesterday with one of her children in a carseat. She has made no public comment since Wednesday's decision. However, her spokeswoman, Susan Carpenter McMillan, said, "If that ruling stands, then you just have an open season on women here in this country for groping and grabbing."

Signaling Clinton's legal troubles weren't over, Starr's staff questioned White House chief of staff Erskine Bowles before the grand jury investigating the Lewinsky matter.

"It was an easy time for me... It wasn't very difficult," Bowles said after he emerged from the federal courthouse in Washington. His appearance had been scheduled for weeks.

"I answered all of their questions wholly and completely," he said. Bowles said many of the prosecutors' questions focused on "what goes on at the White House."

AG invests in tobacco stocks

BOSTON (AP) — Attorney General Scott Harshbarger, who has worked to get the tobacco industry to pay for treating those suffering the effects of smoking, reportedly has investments in mutual funds that own stock in the Philip Morris tobacco company.

Harshbarger is seeking the Democratic nomination for governor. The Boston Globe yesterday said he has investments in Fidelity Puritan and Fidelity Equity Income II, which together own about 8.6 million shares of Philip Morris, valued at slightly more than $1 billion.

The Fidelity mutual funds own stock in dozens of companies, but Philip Morris stock is among the largest of their holdings, the Globe said.

However the newspaper also said Harshbarger's direct ownership of tobacco stock would be very small.

Harshbarger spokesman Edward Cafasso said he did not know if Harshbarger knows about the tobacco stock, but said he does not plan to take his money out of the funds.

"You can own tobacco stocks through a mutual fund and still fight to bring big tobacco to justice," Cafasso said. "There is nothing inconsistent about a shareholder demanding that big tobacco live up to its corporate responsibility."

Cafasso also said Harshbarger's intention to keep his investments was not a contradiction of his advocating that state agencies be forced to give up their investments in tobacco companies.

"Last year, the state banned tobacco holdings in public pension funds.

"If these allegations are in fact true, then I think the attorney general should be held to the same standard as private pensioners who are not allowed to profit from those funds, and he should practice what he preaches," said Phil Stanley, campaign manager of former state senator Patricia McGovern, who also seeks the Democratic gubernatorial nomination.

"The question is, who investigates the investigator?" said former Boston mayor Raymond L. Flynn, another candidate for the Democratic nomination.

Keep doors locked

Propped doors are safe, right? Well, if you live in Greenough, or are friends with people who do, you understand that they are not as safe as you are led to think. As I walk across campus several times daily, I see dorm doors all over propped open for anyone who wants to invite themselves in. I live in Greenough. Heck, we even used to prop our doors, until there was an intruder who stole some personal belongings and put the residents in fear. This male was soon to be known as the BCG bandit, for his appearances in Baker, Chadbourne and Greenough. At the beginning of the year, I was practically an advocate of open doors. My dorm room door was never closed, unless I was changing. But fear changed that for me.

Emily Vacanti

The reason that I'm writing this is not to find who did it, though that would be great, but to ask why people continuously prop dorm doors open on the weekends. When we do that, we're inviting problems in. Security continuously closes the doors, simply doing their jobs. Yet we reopen them? I would understand if this was a small campus, and if things were never stolen and people were never violated, but that's not the case. This is a huge campus, and things are happening all of the time. I was talking to a Baker resident and asked them why the door is continuously propped. The person responded by saying,"Whenever I prop it, I watch who comes in and out." That can't be the truth because strangers are always wandering through there and other dorms. I know this because I've walked through an open door and wandered around. Residents have gotten to know me, but what about before that? Convenience for this resident can put the whole dorm at risk. This is the reason for call boxes, so the doors don't have to be propped open. In many ways, it's more about selfishness than convenience that the doors are opened. Making your life easier may make everyone else's harder.

And the open/unlocked door policy makes it even worse. I have a TV, so I keep my door locked. Yet, many others don't. Others that lock their doors do it mainly because personal items have been stolen, but there are some like me — who have never been robbed — that I know of. We don't want thieves or other bad people where we live, yet we prop the doors open as if to say,"Why not come in, do and take what you like, and then leave without a trace?" People comment on this to me on a daily basis. They basically say "How stupid is everyone? Do they think that it's not going to happen to them?" Well I can tell you one thing: those who think that it will never happen to them will be the next victim.

Two of my friends in my building have been robbed. One was in the bathroom, the other in the hallway. Neither was expecting anything, as they shouldn't have been. Yet they both got a surprise that would change their outlook on campus security. We thought our dorm was safe, which it is, unless doors are propped. We honestly never thought that there would ever be a safety issue. Then there was. In response to that, many of the residents learned to close and lock their doors at all times. It's just an issue of safety, but it's something that many of us have learned, some of us the hard way.

This whole thing just makes me mad. It's like, if you leave your door closed but unlocked, you're screwed. My door is now never unlocked unless I'm in it. My dorm door is never propped anymore, either. Every extra precautionary method is solely because of the BCG bandit. And what's worse is that there's really nothing special about him, or this string of crimes. He's an ordinary guy who got away with a crime that happens all over. So why make such a big deal about it? Because he's an ordinary guy who got away with a crime that happens all over!

One question for everyone who does prop doors: what will it take to unprop them? A small robbery (just a wallet or two)? A big robbery (a whole stereo system or TV)? A personal violation (attack/assault)? Or a murder? Wallets have already been stolen. TVs and stereos have been contemplated, if not stolen (to the best of my knowledge). Assaults have occurred. Let's make sure this never escalates. If you agree with me, and the many others who agree with me, then unprop the doors, and don't prop them again. It's for everyone's safety.

Walkway to hell

Is beauty in the eye of the beholder?

I was driving home from Adams, MA., and something struck me... like, well, like a head-on collision.

Right before the bridge over the Connecticut River meets the mighty tide of Route 9, the Coolidge Bridge begins. What also starts there is a footpath that proceeds along the road all the way into Hadley. More importantly, on warm, sunny days like last Saturday, mayhem begins here as well.

When I got to the path, there was a log jam that had to have been backed up for at least a mile. I figured that there was an accident or a random appearance by a celebrity like John Tesh or Richard Simmons. As I approached the intersection, I saw the cause of the pile-up: hundreds of cars were pulling three-point turns, parents were parallel parking their children's strollers in order to be able to take a jaunt on this "Mecca" of leisure activity.

Ken Mc Donald

"The next thing you know, we will be marvelling at the latest four lane "super-walkway", fully equipped with breakdown and high speed lanes."

I have no problem with anyone getting exercise, in fact, I should have been one of the hoard trying to improve their health and enjoying one of the first days of spring, but I figured that I could get the same effect by driving with the windows down; I mean, I could have sprained an ankle or knee.

In all seriousness, though, my question is, why would you want to walk on a concrete path, with two lanes mind you, when you live in the most beautiful area in the state? I can see the whole point of safety and ease for bikers and rolier- bladers, a smooth path away from all the crazy drivers, and yes there are some. I just have a problem with the mentality that when it's "nice" out, we must go to a town park or common.

There are paths and mountains galore right in our backyards, but the yuppie class wants none of that. Who needs beauty in nature when we have a man-made audacity pawned off as natural? What a great idea, we eliminate all need for imagination and originality, take as much adventure out of life as possible, and market it as a beneficial creation. Thank God for tar or we'd all be screwed, huh?

What happened to those days, not too long ago for some of us, when a spring day meant gallivanting through the woods pretending to be explorers, brave crusaders on a new frontier. Times where you and a friend just shared a place that, for one brief moment, was your own place.

My father and I used to walk to this field that seemed to be a hundred miles from my backyard. When I go there now, I realize that it is just a postage stamp of a lot two hundred yards from my house; back then, it seemed as if I was walking along the Great Plains. It was our place.

I am so glad that I did not grow up and have to look back and say, "Gee, that paved walkway was great. We used to walk the whole length and then we turned around and walked back. Those were the days." I saw all the parents getting out of their Volvos and Acuras with their little ones dressed to the nines in Gap for Kids' latest line of junior urban-wear and realized that such memories are being made right now.

We are approaching an era where concrete will be scenic and nature will be out of style. The next thing you know we will be marvelling at the latest four lane "super-walkway" fully equipped with breakdown and high speed lanes.

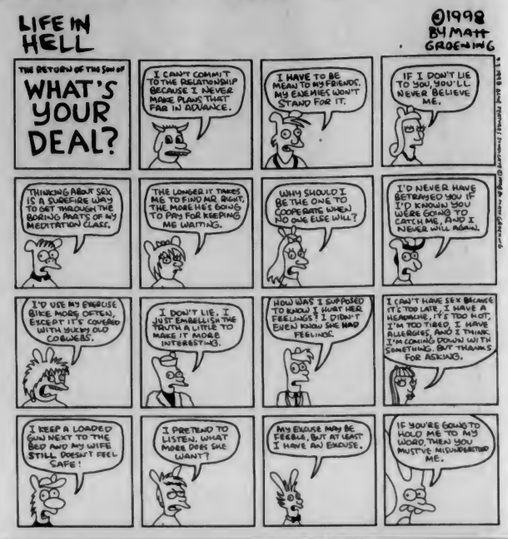
God forbid we venture into the (oh-no) woods, maybe step over a few branches. What a radical idea! Wait! I could go one step further, we could stay overnight, call it "camping." We could stay up until dawn singing songs about bottles of beer on the wall.

Nah, that idea will never fly, where would we plug the computer and television into? Where would we go to the bathroom?

How about we rent The Great Outdoors; even better, we can recycle those beer bottles and donate the money to Greenpeace. We'll stay up until 11 p.m. and get up early the next morning, buy two veggie bagels, a pair of double decaf lattes at Starbucks, then jog along that "oh-so natural" path down by the river. Isn't nature grand?

Yuppies make me sick.

I wonder if they ever read Robert Frost. "Two paths diverge in a yellow wood and I, I took the one less traveled by, and that has made all the difference to me."



From what I saw last Saturday, I think I know the answer.

Respect cultural diversity

To the editor:

Seth Koenig's two references to supposed Zimbabwean cultural practices were crude and offensive (3/30). It cannot be questioned that when a particular country in Africa is used as a butt for derogatory humor like his, there are racist implications. Make fun of your own self and culture, if you feel the need, Seth. The people of Zimbabwe, including the shona "...have a proud history, especially known for its profound spiritual tradition" (quoted from Wednesday's preview of the "Global Divas" concert, by Emily Trask.) Respect cultural diversity!

What a girl wants

Dating. It's a ritual that can get a bit tricky. I've got a bunch of guy friends and occasionally we'll talk about relationships and the different qualities we look for in people.

"What do you look for in a guy?" It's a valid question. Usually when you get asked something like that on the spot, you can rattle off a couple of broad, all encompassing qualities: nice, fun to be around, great sense of humor, blah. Well of course we all want those things, but it's not a very thorough answer.

Marigold Pascual

So four friends and I decided to tackle this question and get specific. The end result was a list that we compiled of the things that make up our perfect guy. It turned out to be a long list, some things were more shallow than others, but they're what we want (not what we need), what we look for, and things we notice — our observances of cool.

Do you know how many things are on this list? 88. But don't worry — I'll spare you our fantasies and discuss the more curious ones.

14) Never buys me stuffed animals.

I mean, come on! Stuffed animals. What a cop-out of a gift. First of all, they're pointless. What am I supposed to do with a furry pseudo-creature or an oversized heart? Owning these things does not hold some sort of prestige. People don't come over and admire your vast array of clutter. Secondly, I am not a little kid; I am not going to have tea parties for my stuffed animal collection or give them cutesy voices. My friends and I are in agreement on this. If a guy were to give us a stuffed animal then it's just not going to work out. That may sound a little extreme but the implications of stuffed animal giving are immense. It says that he's lame. Furthermore it says that he thinks that we're lame. Stuffed animals are symbols for the inane.

Of course there are some girls who like stuffed animals. And if their boyfriends are willing to throw down good money for a stuffed animal because they know (this is key because unwarranted gifts of fuzzy creatures is a major faux pas) their girlfriends like them — then total props for them. I'm sure it's not pleasant for them, maybe a little embarrassing. Like have you ever seen the boyfriends who walk around lost and in awe in Victoria's Secret? Classic. Not only do we like the gift and get use out of it, but more so the fact that he went through some trouble and issues to get it. I like the idea of my boyfriend wandering around in Vicky's Secret. It makes me laugh.

43) Knows that I get along great with guys and it can sometimes seem like I'm flirting, and he gets jealous, but only lets me know it sometimes because it's part of what attracts him to me.

It's a pretty long one, ay? Yes, but it's one that makes a lot of sense if you think about it. It is not uncommon to have a bunch of guy friends if you're a girl. Now, we don't not want our boyfriends to get jealous, but at the same time, he can't get jealous all the time because then that would be a little bit, um, psycho. So you have to find the right balance. Only let us know about it say 25-30 percent of the time.

46) Has cool shoes.

Okay. I know that may sound a little shallow, but it's not. Well, not really. You don't only notice that he has fly mamma-jamma shoes, but what those shoes say about him. Shoes are an investment. They should be able to last. They should be practical. They should have a flair. When you invest in a pair of shoes, you took the time to figure out what the best shoe is, how sturdy they are, and how much they go with. If you went out to the store and bought a cheap pair of shoes that are going to fall apart within a month of wearing them, then that wasn't a smart move. All you're going to have to do is go out and buy another pair of shoes. So cool shoes isn't just about appearance, but about durability and perseverance. All five of us hold snazzy shoes as top observance of cool.

57) Is in to all kind of music; can sing old '80s rap songs and some heavy metal — if the mood strikes him.

First the interest in all kinds of music says that this guy is open minded — he's not afraid to try different things and can appreciate them. We've noticed that if a guy has singular tastes in music, then he himself is a myopic (watch the "Daily Show"?) individual. Have you ever been sitting around and something comes on the radio, a little Heavy D. and someone in the room knows all the words? One of my friends surprised me when she busted out with all the words to "Ice, Ice Baby."

I know that last one was kind of a cop-out, but it's true. No matter how comprehensive the list may be, there are many things we've probably left out. And conversely, there are things on this list that probably don't apply to some people. Like the "wants to share a dog with me." That one is not mine.

I don't know if this list answers any burning questions, or even if it can apply to anyone else. I suspect it does.

My friend Tim was over and read through the list, ticking off all that applied to him. "Are you serious, Marigold? Can start a fire?!" Hey, don't knock it — it's a definite plus.

Tickle your funny bone as the New England Improv Jam rolls into UM Sunday

By Seema Gangasirkar
Collegian Staff

Improvisational comedy takes front stage this weekend as the annual New England Improv Jam brings it to the University of Massachusetts on Sunday.

Organized and hosted by MISSION:IMPROVable, this year's celebration of improv will include a roster of 13 groups.

"This is an ongoing project," says Aaron Krebs, the director of the Improv Jam hosted by MISSION:IMPROVable. "[Because of last year's event], it's growing in popularity. A lot of groups wanted to perform but we have limited space."

Last spring, MISSION:IMPROVable hosted the New England Improv Jam for the first time.

"Last year was great. Everyone had a great time," Krebs said.

Some of the groups performing on Sunday include Harvard's Thin Ice, the University of New Hampshire's Theater Sports and Yale's Just Add Water. Both of UMass' improv groups — MISSION:IMPROVable and This Side Up — will also perform.

Headlining the laugh fest is the world renowned group, ImprovOlympic, out of Chicago. You may have never heard of ImprovOlympic, but you certainly have heard mention of some of the alumni from the group.

"Saturday Night Live" stars Tim Meadows, Mike Meyers and Chris Farley all got their starts in ImprovOlympic while Andy Dick ("Newsradio") and Andy Richter ("Late Night with Conan O'Brien") also have roots with ImprovOlympic.

ImprovOlympic specializes in a style of improv comedy known as "the herald." Krebs described the herald style as "long form, continuously running show, working off of a beginning suggestion. It's an intricately woven [show]."

ImprovOlympic will perform in 8 p.m. in the Student Union Ballroom and will also hold a workshop from 9 a.m.— noon Sunday morning for anyone who is interested.

This year's Improv Jam builds off of last year's successful event.

"It was a unique change for UMass to have other groups [than MISSION:IMPROVable and This Side Up] perform," Krebs said. "Everyone had a great time and [there is] increasing awareness of improv."

Part of Krebs' goal in hosting an event the size of the New England Improv Jam is to facilitate communication and to trade ideas.

"We want to get the groups to talk to each other and create bonds with each other," Krebs said. Some of the bonds MISSION:IMPROVable formed last year have paid off for the group.

"We've been invited to scene festivals," Krebs said. Recently, MISSION:IMPROVable appeared at the Boston NCAA College Improv Tournament, the Georgetown Improv Fest and the Pittsburgh Improvathon. Next up for MISSION:IMPROVable is a week-long trip to Austin, TX, for the Big Stinkin' International Improv Festival.

According to Krebs, the Austin event is the biggest improv fest in the world and will include over 75 groups from around the world, including Spain, Ireland and England as well as the United States.

But right now, Krebs' attention is focused on the New England Improv Jam.

"We made many trips to Campus Activities, researched groups on the Internet," Krebs said. He also added that housing needed to be found for the visiting improv troupes. "The whole group works at it. I couldn't do it without them."

The New England Improv Jam begins at 1 p.m. at the Student Union Ballroom and the Earthfoods Room. Admission is $5 for students and $7 general. One ticket is good all day. For more information, contact Aaron Krebs at 546-5225.

Kaplan discusses Yo La Tengo

COURTESY MICHAEL LAVINE

Yo La Tengo swings into Amherst College tonight.

By Mike Messaros
Collegian Staff

You know, it's not like I don't have better things to do than to sit around and wait for rock stars to call.

OK, I don't.

So 50 minutes after the arranged time, Ira Kaplan from Yo La Tengo finally called me, but apologizing profusely. "Sorry, I overslept," Kaplan said. Hey, who hasn't been there? Looks like rock stars and I have one thing in common.

Yo La Tengo is in town to play Amherst College today. Well, they're not really in town, so much as at home ready to drive to Amherst to play tonight. After spending "most of last year travelling," the band is playing a few college shows here and there, and tonight's follows in that fashion — "hit and run" as he called it.

They are a band that tours often, but has a little down time now. They have recently gotten back from a tour out on the other side of the Pacific — Japan, New Zealand, Australia.

"Tokyo was the highlight of the trip. We look forward to going back there," Kaplan said, despite the overcrowding of the city. One of the perks to going over there was being able to come home with a nice fat pile of hard to find records, like one by the Japanese band. 5.6.7.8s.

Kaplan has always wanted to be a musician, as far back as he can remember as least "ever since I realized that baseball star dream wasn't going to happen." Growing up, he listened to a lot of British Invasion bands, like the Rolling Stones, the Kinks and the Beatles, and less heralded ones like the Move. Yo La Tengo has just released an ep on Matador Records, Little Honda, that contains eight cover songs, from the title track by the Beach Boys, to the Urinals' "Black Hole."

None of these bands, or songs (with the exception of the Kinks), were influential to him or the band growing up. They picked the songs based on what they liked, not on influence. This is not a homage. As for bands he likes today, he would only go so far as to say that "the list changes everyday" but did mention the 5.6.7.8s, and offered "the new Gastr del Sol is great." And he thinks that David Lee Roth was the best singer Van Halen ever had, but not out of any sense of loyalty, just that he really hasn't heard Van Halen since he left the band. But, hey, you get your votes where you can.

When the band writes, it's usually as a group, not by one person coming in with an idea. The ideas for songs spring from rehearsal, and from there on out, the songs are tightened up and arranged (as much as Yo La Tengo songs are tightened up and arranged). Look for more humor in whatever they record coming up. The band has included some great inserts of fake bands ("Electric Tie-Rack," "Unsanitary Napkins") and song "descriptions" with their albums, while their songs have always been

Nakamura to play at Bowker

By Emily Trask
Collegian Staff

A concert performance by world-renowned Shakuhachi Master, Akikazu Nakamura, will be presented by the Asian Dance and Music Program at the University of Massachusetts at Bowker Auditorium tomorrow at 8 p.m.

The Kikazu Nakamura Trio Kokoo was formed in 1995 in order to present the full range of Japan's 700-year old musical tradition of the shakuhachi, which is an elongated, end-blown bamboo flute, and the koto zither — a stringed instrument. Nakamitra founded the Trio Kokoo, and it is the only group that performs both ancient masterpieces and eclectic futuristic works.

In this trio, Nakamura has combined the skills of koto virtuoso Michiyo Yagi and second kotoist Naoko Kikuchi. In their program, the three musicians present a program that is said to serve as a comprehensive introduction to the Zen-derived repertoire of these traditional instruments. The trio presents listeners with over 700 years of music in one evening, using these ancient instruments to appeal to the most discriminating modern audiences. Nakamura calls his music, "a Japanese tradition which is living in the urban atmosphere."

Since the beginning of his career in 1975, Nakamura has performed all over the world, making appearances in such prestigious institutions as Japan's national Theater, the Lincoln Center, the Kennedy Center for the Performing Arts, and NYC's "Five Spot." Nakamura has been said to possess the "stylistic versatility on his instrument of a Herbie Hancock or Ry Cooder."

Besides the Trio Kokoo, Nakamura has been involved in

ABC rises to the top of ratings

By David Bauder
Associated Press

NEW YORK — Thanks to Oscar and Barbara Walters, ABC was able to celebrate a rare victory in the prime-time ratings race. Last week's telecast of the Academy Awards drew the show's best ratings in 15 years, and had twice as many viewers as any other show.

Walters' pre-Oscar special, featuring interviews with Kim Basinger, Burt Reynolds and Will Smith, was the fourth most-watched show, Nielsen Media Research said Tuesday.

ABC won with a 10.5 rating and 18 share, followed by a 9.5 rating and 16 share for CBS. NBC sank to third, with an 8.4 rating and 14 share, followed by Fox's 5.6 rating and 9 share. The WB had a 2.7 rating and 4 share, and UPN had a 2.2 rating and 3 share. Except for ABC, all of the networks had lower ratings than their season averages. It was a week when reruns dominated.

Two midseason replacements, NBC's "Lateline" and ABC's "Two Guys, a Girl & a Pizza Place," tied for 21st place. Other new shows struggled; Fox canceled "Significant Others" after it rated 88th.

Fox's attempt to cash in on the Oscars with "Titanic: Breaking New Ground," and the interactive "Great Skate Debate" show on CBS that invited viewers to vote on their favorite ice skaters both had lackluster showings.

A rating point represents 980,000 households, or 1 percent of the nation's estimated 98 million TV homes. Share is the percentage of in-use televisions tuned to a given show.

The "NBC Nightly News" won the evening news competition with an 8.2 rating and 17 share. ABC's "World News Tonight" and the "CBS Evening News" finished tied for second with 7.6 ratings and 16 shares.

For the week of March 23-29, the top 10 shows, their networks and ratings were:

"Academy Awards," ABC, 34.9; "Seinfeld," NBC, 18.6; "Touched By an Angel," CBS, 16.3; "Barbara Walters Special," ABC, 16.1; "Friends," NBC, 15.9; "Caroline in the City," NBC, 15.3; "Just Shoot Me," NBC, 15.2; "60 Minutes," CBS, 14.6; "CBS Sunday Movie: Chance of a Lifetime," CBS, 13.6; "ER," NBC, 13.5.

Pinsky plans project to celebrate poetry month

By Carl Hartman
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Poet T.S. Eliot called April "the cruellest month" but the Academy of American Poets has made it National Poetry Month and President Clinton has promised to join in by reading his favorite poem in a video to be preserved for posterity. The White House won't yet say what the president will read at the event April 22. Hillary Rodham Clinton will also read her favorite.

Others reading that night will be poet laureate Robert Pinsky and two predecessors: Robert Hass and Rita Dove.

Pinsky began as laureate last October with a project for recording the favorite poems of Americans from all walks of life, read by themselves.

"There will be about 1,200 audio and 200 video," he said in a recent interview.

Last Tuesday, the poetry month got off to an early start as Rep. Martin Olav Sabo, (D-Minn.), displayed an 8-foot-by-20-foot magnetic "poetry wall" in front of the Capitol — one of at least 20 to be set up around the country. Amateur poets can "write" poetry by rearranging words on magnetized tiles on the wall.

In a foreword he wrote for a book, The Magnetic Poetry Book of Poetry, collected by the Minneapolis firm that makes the tiles, Pinsky said: "The poems we assemble on our refrigerators are the compositions of actual American people, produced not for profit but for the fun of it, and to satisfy that peculiar, deep itch to make something new."

Sabo said he has little interest in poetry, but was trying to help out the company that makes the tiles, which provides jobs in his district and does good work promoting literacy.

On the other hand he is an avid fan of the Minnesota Twins, so for reporters and photographers on the Capitol lawn he read four lines from the poem "Casey at the Bat" by Ernest Thayer, which appeared in the San Francisco Examiner June 3, 1888.

But before anyone could actually compose poetry on the wall, the Capitol police asked that it be moved to a nearby bookshop, because, an aide to Sabo said, they considered it a commercial message for the company that makes the tiles.

achingly honest and heartfelt (see "Autumn Sweater" on I Can Hear the Heart Beating As One).

"It's something we'll try to do more of" in their work, Kaplan said. The band wants to show how they can have a sense of humor and be serious, not only in packaging, but in their music and lyrics. As for future projects, nothing's clear, although the band has a bunch of songs that they recorded with Jad Fair (of Half Japanese fame), with Jad doing the vocals. It was recorded "awhile ago... over two sessions last year." Look for that maybe later this year.

As for Matador, he says nothing has changed. Matador was an independent label for a while, and is still one of the best, but has recently signed a distribution deal with Capitol Records. This, of course, has indie purists up in arms.

"I don't pay too much attention," Kaplan said. Any changes that might have happened haven't caught his eye. "Nothing's affected us directly... that we know of," he added.

As for the age old question of what does Yo La Tengo mean... absolutely nothing. Nothing, really. Well, it might mean something, but the name was chosen based on how it sounded.

"We've given up on answering that question," Kaplan said.

Robots take center stage in new Lost in Space adventure

By Dennis Anderson
Associated Press

LOS ANGELES — The robot designed by Jim Henson's Creature Shop for the new movie Lost in Space owes a mechanical nod to its movie robot ancestors, some of which date back to the 1920s.

"My all-time favorite was the robot from Forbidden Planet," says Verner Gresty, one of the supervisors who created the new automaton for Lost in Space.

Robby, the friendly bubble-domed robot from the 1956 science fiction classic Forbidden Planet, inspired a legion of admirers. One Hollywood designer, Fred Barton, makes replicas of Robby at $25,000 a copy for the movie buff who has to have everything.

Like Robby and many other movie robots, cinema's latest mechanical man embodies a mix of qualities ranging from the menacing to the protective — and from the human to the cold and metallic.

Gresty worked with a dozen special effects wizards in England to make the 3,000-pound, 8-foot-tall robot for Lost in Space. Operated by a crew of four, the device can travel at 15 miles an hour.

"He's a pretty fearsome industrial kind of robot," Gresty said in a telephone interview from London. "We worked to get the menacing look of an American football player, with huge shoulders."

The Lost in Space robot is transformed midway through the movie to a mechanical man with the familiar spinning glass dome and light-up chest that fans of the 1960s Lost in Space television series will recognize.

And the robot waffles between good and evil, depending on who's programming it: the villainous Dr. Smith or the good little hero, Will Robinson.

Filmmakers have long been intrigued with mechanical beings, which were an obsession of 19th-century fantasy writers like E.T.A. Hoffmann. The Clown and the Automaton, a one-minute reel made by Georges Melies in 1897, is perhaps the earliest film to feature what would become known as a robot.

The word itself was used by Karel Capek in his 1923 play, R.U.R. (Rossum's Universal Robots). Three years later, Fritz Lang released his futuristic fantasy, Metropolis. The silent movie set in the year 2000 features an evil robot named Maria who incites workers to revolt.

Since then, robots in various guises have graced all sorts of sci-fi movies.

The 1930s saw a slew of robots roaming among fantasy technology in serials like "The Phantom Empire," "Undersea Kingdom" and "The Phantom Creeps." Robots pretty much had a respite during World War II, but the atomic age, with its paranoia and high anxiety, found a robotics renaissance.

Beginning in the late 1940s with The Perfect Woman and continuing throughout the next few decades, robots became central characters in sometimes visionary film plots. Robby, Gort (The Day the Earth Stood Still), R2D2 and C-3PO (Star Wars), and the Terminator were as intriguing as their human counterparts. The Stepford Wives (1974) featured suburban women who were docile, empty-eyed — and coldly, hauntingly mechanical. And "Star Trek: The Next Generation" spent seven years chronicling the android Data's quest to be more human.

"Robots in film and television are an index to the way humans have felt about the ever-changing technology around them," Barton said.

Whether it's friendly or ferocious, people retain their fascination for automatons because of their resemblance to humans, Gresty said.

"Robots are humanoid, like a replica," he said. "You can step away and still get a machine that you've got an affinity with. You want the audience to have a link with him."

One of the big differences in the new Lost in Space robot is that there's no human inside. But the film robot shares the same voice as the original TV series: Dick Tufeld does both.

"This is very close to being a real robot," Gresty said of the movie device. "All the performances done by the robot, like crashing through doorways and getting shot at, they're all done for real."

ISA celebrates diversity

BRIAN MCDERMOTT/COLLEGIAN
Musicians perform a classical instrumental piece during the ISA culture night.

The University of Massachusetts at Amherst India Students Association (ISA) presented "Vividha" — or Diversity — a celebration of India's cultural diversity on Sunday. The UMass Student Union Ballroom was transformed as event organizers covered the walls with an array of colorful slides of scenes from India.

"We wanted the decorations to depict the variety in India," said Jyotsna Advani, a UMass computer science graduate student and vice president of ISA.

The event began with the performance of a South Indian classical piece followed by an instrumental composition using several traditional Indian instruments such as the tabla and the sitar. The remainder of the evening highlighted Indian culture through folk dances, songs, poetry and ended with "Thoda sa pagla, thoda sayaana," an upbeat song taken from the widely regarded Indian film, Aur Pyaar Hua.

One of the most popular and innovative acts of the evening was a hilarious comedy sketch written, directed, and performed by UMass students entitled "Air Force 1 1/2." The audience was also able to taste ethnic Indian food cooked by UMass students, as well as experience the more contemporary India with a DJ party.

"This time we were... hoping to have more undergraduates taking part, but this was a high-stress time for everyone," Jyotsna said, noting that although they had been expecting a larger audience, ISA was happy with the overall outcome of the show.

The ISA has been in existence for several years and is open to students of all ethnicities. It is strongly supported by the Graduate Student Senate since its members are primarily graduate students.

The cultural show has always been the ISA's biggest event, but they do have several other smaller events that take place annually. To welcome incoming freshman and transfer students, the ISA holds a "First Year Welcome." There is also an Independence Day celebration, and this year they also had a movie showing.

As for future plans, the ISA is contemplating its participation in this semester's International Fair which will be held Saturday, April 4. Additionally, the ISA is planning to host another movie screening and/or food festival.

Middle East lecture questioned

For the first time I can remember, in my short career as a reporter, I covered an event which expressed sentiments I felt so personally opposed to that I did not feel comfortable reporting on it, both for fear of biasing the story and of propagating what I believed to be harmful ideas. I came up with a compromise. Instead of having readers lose out entirely on a newsworthy event, I will try to summarize what was discussed and then explain why I feel the ideas are destructive.

"Oslo Unravels: What Future for Middle East Peace?" is an on-going five-part series at Smith College sponsored by the College's Committee on Community Policy, the International Students Organization and the Smith College chapter of Amnesty International. The series is meant to inform and educate the community about the Middle East, paying particular attention to under-reported points of view, namely the Palestinian Perspective. My objections were not with the stated aims of the series, but with a possible agenda which has not been announced.

Bryan Schwartzman

Lecture

On Thursday, March 26, Norman Finkelstein, professor of political theory at New York University and Hunter College, spoke about the precarious Oslo accords at Smith's Seelye Hall. Finkelstein is the author of several books, has spent time in the Middle East and especially the West Bank, and is also the recipient of a Distinguished Teachers' award.

Finkelstein digressed to the 19th century and discussed European colonialism and exploitation. He argued that the conquering of an indigenous population occurs in four stages or methods: extermination, expulsion, encirculation and enslavement. He said as the political climate of the world changed and foreign powers could no longer exterminate the indigenous population, these powers would try the next tactic on the list.

Finkelstein cited the American conquest of the West and the expansion of Nazi Germany as examples of colonial conquest and murder. Zionism, the Jewish people's struggle to establish a state in the land formerly known as Palestine, was stated as analogous to the first two events.

"Zionism as an idea is incompatible with peace with the indigenous population," he said.

Reaction

It's very frightening when a "teacher of the year" speaks to a respected audience and becomes part of the problem instead of the solution. Linking events in history that have entirely different circumstances is one of the most misleading things a teacher can do. While killing is always killing, the fact that Jews were returning to a land they had once inhabited should figure in his careful equation somewhere.

More importantly, his statement that a Jewish state is incompatible with peace is not only pessimistic, it attacks the legitimacy of a state celebrating its 50th birthday. When an event that is supposed to evaluate the Israeli–Palestinian peace accords questions the right of Israel to exist, I have to question the legitimacy of the event. It's one thing to criticize a government, it's another matter entirely to say that a government does not have the right to exist.

If we're going to understand the Palestinian perspective, it is not helpful or constructive to reduce the Israelis to mongrels of evil. There is enough room for both the Palestinians and Israelis to co-exist peacefully, and that is what needs to be emphasized, not hate.

Anyone who was at this presentation, understood that wrongs have been committed on both sides for more than half a century, but proclaiming oneself a Zionist is not proclaiming oneself a racist!

Never the last word

The other events in the series may bring a different perspective, and I would strongly encourage those interested to attend the events and come to their own conclusions.

There are four more events scheduled in the series, ranging from the Israeli–Palestinian conflict to women and the Middle East peace movement. For more information contact Arky Markham at 413 586-0345.

Without affirmative action laws, Berkeley minority enrollment falls

By Laura Schiebelhut
Daily Californian

BERKELEY, Calif. (U-Wire) — The first freshman class admitted to University of California Berkeley without affirmative action will have a dramatically lower population of under-represented minorities, Chancellor Robert Berdahl announced yesterday. Because the number of blacks, Latinos and Native Americans admitted to the university this fall dropped by more than half, Berdahl said he and other top university officials intend to personally call minority students who received acceptance letters to encourage them to attend the university.

University officials called the selection of next year's freshman class the most competitive admissions process in campus history. Only 27 percent of the record number of students applying to UC Berkeley — 29,961 applicants — were admitted. The number of blacks, Latinos and Native Americans admitted made up 10.4 percent of the total pool of students admitted, compared to 23.1 percent last year. Of the three ethnicities, blacks showed the sharpest drop, comprising 2.4 percent of all the admitted students — a 64.5 percent decline from last year.

In addressing the drop, Berdahl emphasized the competitiveness of the admissions process, citing that more than 800 of the under-represented minority students turned away had an average grade point average of 4.0 and Scholastic Assessment Test score of 1200.

"There are a lot of under-represented students [not accepted] who could have done exceedingly well here," he said. "Virtually all of the African American students admitted had very close to a 4.0. Out of this pool of applicants we could have admitted two or three classes that would be the envy of other universities."

The number of whites and Asians admitted slightly increased. The percentage of white students accepted jumped slightly from 33.1 percent to 34.2 percent of those admitted, while the number of Asians rose from 35.5 percent to 38.3 percent of the entire pool of admits.

The number of students who declined to state their ethnicities also grew significantly from 6 percent last year to 15.8 percent this year — a factor which complicates the statistical admissions picture, campus officials said.

Berdahl said he was saddened to see that the number of under-represented minorities will decline next year.

"I am very disappointed that our entering class will not better the impressive diversity that distinguishes this state," he said. "We know from our own experience that a great many of the under-represented minority students who were not offered admission would have succeeded here and would have contributed to the excellence of this university."

Berdahl also said that changes to the admissions process would be considered in upcoming discussions but did not predict major alterations. He also stressed the importance of strengthened outreach efforts.

"We substantially increased our recruitment efforts and as a result, applications from [minority] groups remained high," Berdahl said. "We also created the most comprehensive admissions review process permitted under the law."

We will review our admissions process, but we cannot change the process in such a way that takes race into account — that's against the law," he said. "This campus intends to do all that is possible to encourage [minority] students who have been admitted to enroll at Berkeley. I will personally phone as many of these students as I can."

Bob Laird, the university's director of undergraduate admissions and relations with schools, said this year's admissions process was more thorough than in years past because of a new process that takes into account more factors on a student's application. Laird said that under the new process, the academic and nonacademic accomplishments of each individual applicant are examined carefully along with the background in which those successes were achieved. The process included identifying the number of academic resources — including the number of Advanced Placement classes — available at each applicant's high school.

"We made much better informed decisions this year as a result of looking at each applicant individually and carefully," Laird said. "Every application was read twice'

Letter from the Developing Nations Editor

As the new editor of the Developing Nations page, it is my privilege to cover issues relevant to a good three-fourths of humanity. The developing world is inadequately — and at times incorrectly — covered by the US press; too much emphasis is placed on the problems, leading people to believe this area of the world is a mass of corruption and poor leadership, when in fact these nations have so much more to offer that we unfortunately don't hear about.

As students we may not be able to change much on a national level as far as content and coverage goes, but we can begin here at UMass by creating an awareness about these countries we label as "developing" that goes beyond the sensationalist headlines that tend to only portray the misery and plight of far-away places. That means examining issues from viewpoints that we might not necessarily agree with; voicing the "other" side to global affairs.

Meher Singh

The goal of the developing nations page is to cover news and cultural issues on an international level as well as right here on campus, which at the same time reflects the opinions and comments of the UMass community.

That said, I encourage all students interested in contributing to the developing nations page to contact me at 546-1659 or email at meher@student.umass.edu. No prior experience is necessary!

Editors' note: Today's page is a combination of the Developing Nations and Multicultural Affairs sections of the Collegian. There is clearly a very fine line between these desks as issues pertaining to developing nations are undoubtedly multicultural as well. This page therefore reflects our collaborative effort to provide a more comprehensive coverage of themes that are timely, and of interest and importance to the entire UMass community.

invitation to the campus

open house

Dear readers,

One behalf of the staff of The Massachusetts Daily Collegian, I would like to extend an invitation to our Spring '98 Open House this Monday from 11 a.m. to 4 p.m. in 113 Campus Center. Each semester, we open the doors of our offices and give members of the UMass community the opportunity to find out how the paper is produced each day.

More importantly, the Open House is a good way for undergraduates interested in working for the Collegian to find out how they can become involved. If you are an aspiring young writer looking to develop a portfolio of clips, the Collegian is a tremendous resource. As a writer for New England's largest college daily, you will write about and photograph the biggest names and events that hit the valley. In the past few semesters, staffers have garnered interviews with the likes of Conan O'Brien, Tricky, Wyclef Jean, The Verve, The Indigo Girls, Senator Edward Kennedy, Dean Smith, Jerry Tarkanian, and Rick Pitino to name a few. From major concerts and sporting events to political debates, your student newspaper provides solid hands–on reporting experience that places you in the trenches with nationally recognized writers.

However, the Collegian isn't just a place for budding wordsmiths to develop their writing. Is graphic arts or web design your thing? Then you need to be a part of our production staff responsible not only for the visual aspects of the paper itself, but the majority of its advertising as well. What better way to wow a perspective employer than with a portfolio full of professional–quality ads you designed or as a member of the Collegian's up–and–coming on–line edition? Maybe you spend your days in SOM dreaming of owning your own company or holding down that big corner office on Madison Ave. If that's the case, the Collegian offers tremendous experience in sales, finance, operations, and promotions. As a financially independent RSO, you can be part of a team that manages a sizeable small business.

Whatever your strength or interest, the Collegian is a great place to gain the practical experience that will help you advance when you've left Amherst in the dust.

As applications for fall '98 positions are currently being accepted, now is a great time to start thinking about what you'll be doing next semester. Do you want to be reading the Collegian in between classes in the fall, or do you want to be a part of something great?

I look forward to speaking with you this Monday. If you have any questions or concerns, feel free to contact me at 545–3500 from 9 a.m. to 5 p.m.

Sincerely,

Christopher Stamm

Mike Threehouse is in his second year as head coach of the Bonnies, after finishing last season at 15-23.

The Dayton Flyers are teetering at an even .500. They recently ended a five-game losing streak with a 5–1 win over Butler University. They will travel to Rhode Island tomorrow before taking on UMass on Sunday. Rhode Island and UMass will be Dayton's first outings against Atlantic 10 opponents.

Kary Zimmerman, a senior shortstop, has been one of the Flyers' strongest hitters so far this season, going 22–for–76 at the plate, and holds a batting average of .355. Also making a strong contribution has been Tanya Leet, who leads the team in RBI. She carries a batting average of .338, and has already hit one home run this season.

Dayton has been led on the mound by sophomore pitcher Sara Hatcher. Hatcher holds a record of 6–5, and an ERA of 1.61.

what we need to do to complete our goals," McAuliffe said.

UMass' goalie, Peggy Nieves, personified McAuliffe's statement by putting together another great effort in net. Nieves made seven saves on the way to another UMass victory.

"Peggy has been the backbone of our defense, and she just continues to get better with every game," McOsker said.

This weekend the Minutewomen head back to Cambridge for the CWPA League Tournament hosted by Harvard. UMass is not expected to play Harvard again. Their schedule includes Boston University at 8 a.m., Boston College at 11 a.m. and Wellesley at 2 p.m.

The Minutewomen head into this weekend's competition undefeated in their league and hope to leave Harvard still undefeated.

"Many of these teams are fairly new programs, so they're still learning the ropes, but at the same time we can not overlook teams like BU, BC and Wellesley," McAuliffe said.

"There are various teams we will face that could present excellent tests and keep us in game shape for nationals," said McAuliffe about the remaining competition.

McOsker is pleased with the play of his team, and hopes that people will continue to step up for the remainder of this season.

"The whole team has played really well, I just want to see them keep their intensity level up and that drive focused," said McOsker.

The team has been doing an excellent job which is apparent by their record. Certain players like Grogan, Hupp and Claudia Clement have been spectacular on offense while doing great work defensively.

Barbara Hickey and Newell have stepped it up to perform at a level that could have been expected. Hickey, who was supposed to be an emotional leader, has done a terrific job of putting the ball in the net. Newell has become the true freshman sensation, finding her way to the back of the net more than anyone could expect from a young player.

"Everyone is playing well, but it takes an effort from all seven people in the pool to get the job done," McOsker said.

It will take that type of effort again for UMass to stay undefeated in the CWPA at Harvard this weekend.

Men's tennis set to begin stretch run

By Sanford Appell
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts men's tennis team is looking to conclude the regular season with a string of victories heading into the Atlantic 10 tournament. That run would have to begin this afternoon, as the Minutemen play Seton Hall in South Orange, New Jersey.

UMass has faced a much tougher schedule this season, but coach Judy Dixon feels the remaining three matches are winnable.

"Seton Hall is one of those programs that is right about the same level as ours," Dixon said. "Those are the schools we want to beat, because talent wise, we match up with them."

Coach Dixon is hoping her squad can get past the Pirates despite playing without Bo Navarro. Navarro is suffering through back trouble, and is hoping to return for the Tufts match next week.

"We have played on through injuries all season," Dixon said. "We have to expect and be prepared for them, because the sport is becoming more physically related."

The Minutemen now possess a 9–6 overall record, but have struggled through the spring portion of their season. Three wins over the next week would give them an above .500 record for the spring.

"It is important to finish strong," Dixon said. "We don't want to continue slumping, heading into the tournament, we need to get our rhythm back beforehand."

The key for UMass will be to play strong at the top. Seton Hall's top half lineup has been very potent thus far for 1–3 singles. Todd Cheney, back in place at No. 1 along with Rob Manchester and Alex Aller, will be heavily relied upon for this match.

"If we can take two out of three at the top of the order, we should be alright," Dixon said. "I'm confident Parsa Samii and my other guys will pull through for us."

With Navarro sidelined, it appears that Ryan Gately and Kevin Curley will round out the lineup for the Minutemen.

Samii has anchored the lower half of the lineup all spring. He began this year at No. 6 singles and went through a rut before establishing himself as the team's most consistent winner in the spring while moving up considerably.

Samii has posted a 10–2 record in singles dating back to the Cornell Invitational in early February. After today's match, the Minutemen will return home for dates with Fairfield and Tufts next week.

"This match against Seton Hall is our last true test until the tournament," Dixon said. "Fairfield and Tufts have good programs, but we expect to beat them."

Women's tennis gears up for tournament

By Sanford Appell
Collegian Staff

The road has been rocky, but there appears to be light at the end of the tunnel for the Massachusetts women's tennis team.

The Minutewomen have played some of the nation's best teams, but heading into the final stretch, they remain a respectable 7–9 overall this year.

This after taking on the likes of Ivy League powerhouses Yale and Princeton as well as perennially strong Tulane.

Those matches proved to be too difficult at this stage, but the team expects to be more prepared for similar opponents next season after gaining experience by playing at a higher level.

However, there have been bright moments, such as a clutch win over conference rival Temple in February.

More recently, UMass fell to Syracuse 6–1, but at this juncture, the schedule seems to be taking a turn for the better.

The Minutewomen will play three matches this weekend that they feel they are capable of winning.

"I am looking for a strong set of matches this weekend," coach Judy Dixon said. "We have played the best, and now we will take on some teams, that we are more comfortable playing against."

UMass will face three conference opponents in Fordham, LaSalle and Rhode Island.

All three matches will take place at Fordham beginning tomorrow morning at 9 a.m.

The Minutewomen appear to be heading towards a third seed at the Atlantic 10 tournament after knocking off the fourth best team in Temple.

Virginia Tech, at 35th in the nation, and George Washington stand firmly in place at the top two spots.

This weekend's opponents are near the bottom of the conference with URI and La Salle currently at 10th and 11th, as well Fordham.

"It is important that the team stays focused," Dixon said. "Although these are certainly not our toughest opponents, they are division rivals and we need all three matches."

UMass holds a 22–6–1 advantage in the ongoing rivalry verses URI, and defeated La Salle the only time they faced them, back in 1991. The Fordham match will be a first time meeting.

Coach Dixon will look for her players to rebound from some of the losses against such stellar competition earlier on.

Ola Gerasimova at No. 1 singles holds a 7–10 overall record this year, followed by Marie Christine Caron (7–13) at No. 2.

The Minutewomen will next travel to play Williams after this weekend's action.

Women's track to open in Georgia

By Jana Benscoter
Collegian Correspondent

The Massachusetts women's track and field team is heading down south for tough competition. The UMass squad will be facing Georgia, Alabama, Auburn, Kentucky and Western Carolina tomorrow at 1 p.m. The meet will be taking place at Georgia.

This is the first time UMass will be facing these southern competitors, several from the Southeastern Conference, one of the nation's toughest leagues. Georgia is known for it's excellent sprinters and field participants, while the Wildcats of Kentucky are known for having the best recruiting class last year. Auburn and Alabama are also strong competition, known for being among the best in the conference.

There are 20 athletes heading down south and among them are four freshmen: Melissa Henderson, Carole LaPlante, Chrystal Murphy and Allison Tostevin. All four have competed during the indoor season and have some experience under their belts. Henderson runs cross country and placed sixth in the indoor Atlantic 10 championships.

LaPlante and Tostevin both throw the shot put and discuss. While both have had experience with the shot put during the indoor meets, they will be experiencing the discuss for the first time in Georgia. For Murphy, she'll be running further with the hurdles, going from 55m indoors to 100m outdoors. She will also be involved with the 200m.

An additional event that will take place in Georgia is the 4x1 mile relay.

"This will take time and discipline," assistant coach Elizabeth Zimney said, noting her confidence for the event.

This meet will be the first time for many of the women to compete again; the last time that the squad competed was four weeks ago.

"The season is short and this meet will be good for the girls because it will be tough. Hopefully this meet will get them prepared for the road ahead and get them focused," Zimney said. "Our season is intense and we need the girls to be intense the entire way through the season until the end of May.

"This trip is a great way for the team to get back into competition and show their all around abilities in each event."

Men's gym to host regional

By Jamie Jee
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts men's gymnastics team will be getting ready to host part of the big show tomorrow, as they prepare to compete in the 1998 NCAA East Regional Championship. The event will kick off at 7 p.m. in the Curry Hicks Cage.

UMass managed to qualify eight individual gymnasts to take part tomorrow. Juniors Phil Lieberman, Mike Plourde, Stephen Pryor; sophomore Jeff LaValle; freshmen Clayton Kent, Andy Leis and Bryan McNulty will all be facing many of the top gymnasts in the country. LaValle finished seventh all-around at last year's East Regional, as he qualified for the 1997 NCAA National, earning Academic All-America honors after being named EIGL Rookie of the Year.

The Minutemen will strive to represent the Atlantic 10 well as they face a large Big Ten contingent, the only represented in the team competition. The University of Iowa will get top billing as they earned the top seed based on its 230.175 regional qualifying average. Following closely behind will be Ohio State, Penn State, Michigan State, Michigan and Illinois.

The Hawkeyes come in as the Big Ten champions after four straight second place finishes in the conference championship. The Buckeyes of Ohio State should also be in the mix of things, as they came in as the two seed and the two-time defending East Regional champion.

UMass is coming off its second place finish at the ECAC Championships where three Minutemen medaled in their individual events. In West Point, N.Y., LaValle gave the team a boost towards that finish by competing in four events and placing third in the all-around event and the parallel bars. He will face top-ranked Mike Dutka of Penn State and Travis Romagnoli of Illinois in the all-around program.

Only Temple outpaced UMass as Lieberman and Surgent contributed with key performances. Lieberman managed to take a second on the vault and a third on the floor exercise while Surgent grabbed a silver on the pommel horse.

Also competing were Pryor, freshman J.J. Hershey, as well as seniors Michael Sangirardi and Dan Young. As Young and Sangirardi near the end of their collegiate gymnastic careers at the university, they will try to finish them off nicely after imparting the wisdom they have gained through experience onto the underclassmen.

Sangirardi turned made important contributions throughout the year for the Minutemen, competing on the high bar and vault. Young also made his presence felt after sitting out last season injured.

Lax faces date with Devil(s)

By Casey Kane
Collegian Staff

On the College Lacrosse USA web page, former Johns Hopkins goaltender Quint Kessenich writes a weekly column. This week, among the other items Kessenich penned, the popular piece includes an item subtitled "Duke is No Fluke."

Tomorrow at 12:30 p.m. at Richard F. Garber Field, the members of the Massachusetts men's lacrosse team will find out for themselves if Kessenich's claim holds true.

But the No. 8 Minutemen (6–0) will be prepared for the No. 5 Blue Devils, who despite losing a number of talented players from their final four roster, still remain among the country's elite.

"A lot of their success and final four was due to their seniors last year, their leadership, but they did have a lot young players that really contributed for them," said UMass coach Greg Cannella, who is not surprised by Duke's national ranking, nor its 7–1 record.

The Blue Devils, who claimed a win in last year's 8–7 double overtime contest in Durham, N.C., will bring a significantly different roster to Amherst than what the Minutemen faced last season. Gone are midfielder Jim Gonnella and defensemen Tyler Hardy and Dave Stilley. And gone is standout goalie Joe Kirmser.

Duke will, however, have some of the program's mainstays on the field. Senior John Fay, who has 21 goals and 14 assists, and sophomore Jarod Frood, who has 22 tallies and 14 feeds lead the Blue Devil charge. The two represent one of the strongest parts of Duke's attack, but the Minutemen are not focusing on any one person.

"We have to play great team defense," Cannella said. "If you focus on one person and one person alone the other people are going to burn you. It has to be an overall great effort of the six guys we have on the field, plus [goalie] John [Kasselakis]."

In Kirmser's place will be senior Craig Seyffer, who has recorded 75 saves and allowed 44 goals in Duke's 13 games. He has posted a save percentage of .630 and a goals against average of 7.44.

"He's a guy who's been around," Cannella said. "I think he's got some experience in his past. And they've won seven straight playing with him in the goal. They have good defense in front of him. And as a senior, I think he's probably saying 'I've got my chance, I'm going to take it and run.' We're going to have to shoot well against him."

Whether or not Nick Hartofilis will be game-ready is still up in the air. The sophomore midfielder, who has six goals and an assist on the year, broke his index finger a few weeks ago and was scheduled to miss two or three weeks of action. Cannella however, is not planning on Hartofilis' absence.

"We're preparing for him," he said. "We're going to prepare for him to play on regular six-on-six situations and on extra man, because he's one of their guns on extra man. But we're going to be prepared for him whether he plays or not."

The Blue Devils will have to be prepared for a Minuteman team that has jumped out the best start since 1987. Undefeated after six games, UMass has three main Mikes to thank on the offensive end — DelPercio, Janowicz and McKeefrey, who have recorded 55 points, as well as a key supporting cast, and a cohesive defensive unit at the other end.

UMass faces St. Joseph's at home in baseball doubleheader tomorrow

By Kathleen Ralls
Collegian Staff

Tomorrow's doubleheader against Atlantic 10's St. Joseph's marks the reopening of the Massachusetts men's baseball team's home schedule at the Earl E. Lord Field. They will conclude the three-game series on Sunday at 12 p.m. Their original home opener on Wednesday against Siena was postponed in the bottom of the third inning due to rainy conditions.

UMass (10–6) was leading the Saints 1–0 as Pete Gautreau scored on Matt Wolcott's fielder's choice in the bottom of the second. Nick Skirkanich made the brief appearance on the mound for the Minutemen, giving up two hits in three innings.

UMass' offense has been a spectacle as of late, with junior Doug Clark leading the team with five home runs. He is followed closely by Gautreau with four homers including a grand slam. Senior Muchie Dagliere leads the team with a .492 batting average and an impressive 25 RBI count. Sophomore Steve Asadoorian trails closely at a .429 clip. Centerfielder Clark is hitting .421 and is second in the team in RBI with 23.

While the offense has continued to be the strong point, the pitching is making steady progress. Junior Bill Cooke has captured three wins to one loss with a 2.70 earned run average. He has two complete games under his belt as well. Travis Veracka, Ryan Cameron and Jeff Puleri all stand at 2–0. Veracka is second on the team with a 3.15 ERA.

The Hawks have been see-sawing through their season with a clutter of wins and losses in their record column. While tapering along the .500 meridian, they have struggled in most of their contests, climbing victories by small margins over Virginia Commonwealth, Drexel, Akron and La Salle.

St. Joseph's offense is led by senior Mike Sposato, who leads the team in hitting, followed by freshman infielder Kevin Kirkby and junior Jamie Clancy. Jack Marcellus, Chris Heck and Mike Gondas have been shouldering a majority of the pitching duties.

When the two teams met last year, the Minutemen went undefeated (3–0) including a convincing 19–1 victory.

Minutemen Notes: Muchie Dagliere has hit safely in 15 straight games... There are currently no plans to reschedule Wednesday's matchup with Siena... Yesterday's game at Hartford was also cancelled due to poor weather conditions.

Young UConn team to host women's lax

By Seth Koenig
Collegian Staff

There is a newcomer to the NCAA family of women's lacrosse teams. Beginning recently, the University of Connecticut is fielding a brand new squad to take part in the age old sport, and who better to welcome the Huskies to the tradition than the Massachusetts Minutewomen, their collegiate regional rivals.

UMass, fresh off of a hard fought double overtime victory against Brown in the miserable weather of Wednesday afternoon, will attempt to handily defeat the young UConn team. As the Minutewomen are looking as tough as they have in years behind an impressive 3–2 record in a difficult season opening stretch, Connecticut will continue to try and get their feet planted as an inexperienced group looking up from the bottom of the totem pole.

Working to the Huskies' advantage is the tutelage of their coach, Bonnie Rosen.

"UConn will be technically and strategically sound," Massachusetts coach Francesca McClellan said. "They have a strong player as their coach, and she's a defender by trade, so they'll be sound. They won't have a lot of speed, though, because they're a new program."

Playing against a newer team could be seen as a much needed break in the action for UMass after a stressful two weeks. Over the past week and a half, the Minutewomen went 1–2 against Yale, Temple and Brown; three schools that were in the double digits in the victory column a year ago. One team, Temple, advanced all the way to the NCAA Final Four in 1997. Coming up on the docket after Connecticut is Dartmouth, a team that boasted a 10–4 record last season and is returning a respectable 9 starters.

Still, McClellan and her team refuse to overlook the Huskies.

"We're only, as of today, ready for UConn," McClellan said. "UConn will try to trap us in the defensive end a little bit, so we're preparing for that. We will be expecting a zone against them, so we'll review how to attack that as well."

Leading the charge offensively for the Minutewomen will be junior attack Laura Korutz who, with 17 points scored this season, is looking to lead the team in that category for her third consecutive year. She will be playing alongside sophomore midfielder Stephanie Pavlick, whose game winner against Brown finished off a hat trick and continued a personal hot streak. Tri-captains Jen Bowen and Melissa Anderson play the roles of field generals, setting the pace for the team.

On defense for Massachusetts, senior tri-captain Amy Leder runs the show, as her fiery drive and emotions inspire the squad. Sophomore Jessica Passanese and freshman Denise Brey played crucial roles in thwarting the Brown attack two days ago as well. One of the talented freshman duo of Tara Durkin and Jen Nardi will represent UMass in goal. Durkin made 15 saves in her start against the Bears.

The Minutewomen need to remember though, to not overlook the Huskies.

"Most importantly, we're not getting cocky," McClellan said. "We're taking in one game at a time, and looking to improve each time."

Softball looks to make up game against Hartford

By Jackie Leroux

Mother Nature ruined yet another game yesterday. The Massachusetts women's softball team was scheduled to play the University of Hartford at 3 p.m., but Wednesday's rain left the Hawks' home field too soaked too play. The Minutewomen and the Hawks will attempt to square off again on Monday at 3 p.m.

In the meantime UMass will be focusing on its slate of Atlantic 10 competition this weekend. Tomorrow the Minutewomen will take on a doubleheader with St. Bonaventure. Sunday's schedule will feature a doubleheader with Dayton. Both competitions are set to kick off at 12 p.m.

The Minutewomen (14–10, 3–0) are currently on a seven- game winning streak. With the cancellation of yesterday's game, they will have a full week of practice under their belts. Also working on UMass' side will be the fact that they will be playing at home this weekend for the first time this season.

"It's always nice to be home, to not have to be on a bus and traveling," coach Elaine Sortino said. "We always look forward to our home opener, it's a very exciting day."

Along with receiving some excellent pitching from junior Danielle Henderson and freshman Carrie Jeffries, UMass has been very solid at the plate lately. Last weekend, UMass hit .341 as a team. Every Minutewomen with more than one at-bat had a hit, including junior transfer Nicole DeMauro, who had her first career hit. Two Minutewomen had six hits, and four had five hits apiece. Every UMass player that had at least three plate appearances scored a run, including junior Mandy Galas, who had seven.

The St. Bonaventure Bonnies have never beaten the UMass softball team. UMass holds a 19–0 all-time edge, including a sweep in last season's double header.

CWPA Tourney is next for undefeated water polo

The No. 7 Massachusetts women's water polo team made an important stop before heading into this weekend's CWPA (Collegiate Water Polo Association) Tournament. UMass had to go to Harvard on Wednesday night in what was an important East coast battle.

"We knew that Harvard would be one of our toughest games on the East coast, this is a team we must be ready for," coach Dan McOsker said.

The Minutewomen made short work of Harvard, defeating the Crimson by a final of 10–1. UMass came up with another strong effort defensively, while just allowing the offense to get into its own rhythm.

"We played very well again on defense, and gave it a real solid effort all around, but these games are allowing us to work on certain aspects of our game," assistant coach Dan McAuliffe said.

The win over Harvard improved the UMass record to 16–3 overall and 3–0 in CWPA play. The Minutewomen disposed of Harvard on the strength of five goals from Katie Grogan and four from Marcie Hupp. The Minutewomen also received strong play from Maria Velazquez, who helped create the scoring opportunities with three assists.

Freshman Sarah Newell continued her strong play on Wednesday night when the netted another goal. Newell has been playing extremely consistently, finding a way to score in just about every game. This consistency has been present all season from most of the players on the team.

"We need consistent play, and a strong effort every game, and the players know this because that is

Newsweek: Swiss knew of Nazi banking

NEW YORK (AP) — A forthcoming report concludes that Switzerland's central bank knew it was supporting the Nazi regime through gold and trade dealings, Newsweek said in its editions on newsstands Monday.

A source close a Swiss-appointed historical commission told the magazine the report found that commercial banks also were aware they were financing the war, but less so.

But Jean-Francois Bergier, the head of the commission that wrote the report, was quoted Sunday as saying the study would not be much help to Holocaust victims and heirs trying to include the central bank in their lawsuit against three commercial banks.

"They will, however, be a little disappointed," he told the Zurich-based weekly SonntagsZeitung. "It might not be so bad (for Switzerland) if they file their complaint now, because our report will then pull the rug from under them all the more."

The plaintiffs have filed a multi-billion dollar suit against Credit Suisse, Union Bank of Switzerland and the Swiss Bank Corp., and are in talks to negotiate a global settlement.

Students riot over Ohio's early last call

ATHENS, Ohio (AP) — For the second year in a row, a rowdy crowd confronted police in this college town Sunday as bars closed early for the switch to daylight savings time.

An estimated 2,000 people gathered outside downtown bars that cater to Ohio University students before the bars started closing at 2 a.m., half an hour earlier than usual because of the time change, authorities said.

Police dressed in riot gear fired rubber and wooden projectiles into the crowd when people started throwing bottles, chunks of pavement and coins.

"The rubber didn't work and the kids were actually enticing us to fire at them," Athens County Sheriff Dave Redecker said. "We then moved on to the wooden ones. I'm sure those knee knockers took some toll."

No civilians reported injuries, he said.

Police eventually dispersed the crowd with batons.

Five officers suffered minor injuries and at least 30 people were arrested, authorities said. More arrests were possible as police check photographs and videotapes, Redecker said.

One year earlier, the same time change sent about 1,000 people into the streets. Forty-seven people were arrested, 34 of them students.

"I think the students are trying to start a new tradition," Redecker said. "This incident was much more violent than last year, which doesn't give us much hope for next year."

A closer look at Amherst ballot

AMHERST — Tomorrow, students will once again be given the opportunity to make their presence felt in town politics with the chance to cast their ballots in the town Select Board vote.

Five candidates: University of Massachusetts student Jason Vecchio, Margot Parrot, Dolly Jolly, incumbent Bryan Harvey, and Teri Hwei Ling Greeney — are vying for two open spots.

The following are profiles and platforms of these five candidates.

Jason Vecchio

Why should a university student be voted into the Select Board, anyway? According to University of Massachusetts senior Jason Vecchio, it is precisely because he is a student.

"The other Select Board candidates don't identify the problem between students and the town as a priority in their platforms," Vecchio said. "They don't have the appropriate background or experience to act as bridges between the two communities."

Vecchio said having a student on the Board would be an excellent opportunity to get other students involved in town issues, and to ensure that students are fairly represented in the town.

"There needs to be a voice on the Select Board to act as a counter to the comments made by Hill Boss, which were really appalling," Vecchio said.

Boss had suggested placing kegs by on-campus polls to improve student voter turnout.

"I feel [Boss] wasn't representing me," Vecchio said. "We need someone to represent those that have been here two years or twenty years."

Vecchio himself plans to take up residence in Amherst after his graduation in May, whether he wins a seat on the Select Board or not.

In answer to questions about his lack of political experience, Vecchio said he has had an amazing record of advocating issues, and would be very capable of serving as a Select Board member.

Vecchio and [Student Government Association trustee] Brian Tirrell were responsible for creating the polling places on campus for precincts 4A and 10A in Southwest residential area. Vecchio has also had a strong relationship with State Senators Stan Rosenberg and Ellen Story for the past four years.

As Student Center for Education Research and Advocacy (SCERA) coordinator, Vecchio advocated the publication of year end course and teacher evaluation surveys, so students could know reactions to particular courses and instructors prior to pre-registration.

"I have a really strong base of political experience, stronger than that of other students at the same point in their careers," Vecchio said.

Vecchio is knowledgeable of non-University related issues as well. He supports a parking garage which will fulfill business needs, yet has a minimal impact in the surrounding community. He also supports a project to convert the Amherst Cinema

UM students run for Town Meeting

BRIAN MCDERMOTT / COLLEGIAN

Town meeting candidate Jolyon Yates.

By Paul Hayes
Collegian Staff

AMHERST — Two University of Massachusetts students running for Town Meeting spots in tomorrow's town elections hope to bridge the gap between students and local residents.

James Eltringham and Jolyon Yates, both residents of Coolidge residence hall in Town Meeting Precinct 4 in Southwest Residential area, look forward to representing students in Town Meeting.

Eltringham, a freshman journalism major, is enamored with the prospect of taking part in Town Meeting. He hopes to be very active in Town Meeting, and would like to curb the problems between the students and the town.

"I fell in love with this town, and I want to ensure it will be a place where students feel comfortable," Eltringham said.

Jolyon Yates, a junior finance major and economics minor, is running for Town Meeting on the platform that he will vote for tax cuts, which he said Amherst needs.

"There's a lot of taxes in Amherst, which I feel is unfair," Yates said. "Landlords pass the tax off onto students, and businesses pass it off onto consumers."

Both are attempting to enter a Town Meeting which past and current student representatives claim dwells on subjects unimportant to students and is not responsive to its student members.

UMass student and Town Meeting member Brian McCarthy said when he began attending Town Meeting, some Amherst resident members came off as anti-student.

"[Amherst resident Town Meeting members] always mention students breaking laws, they fail to recognize we're the backbone of the community," McCarthy said. "Half the town works for the school, yet they badmouth it."

Town Meeting member Brian Tirrell, also a UMass student, agreed that Town Meeting doesn't take into consideration the needs of University students.

Tirrell also referred to Select Board member Hill Boss' statement as indicative of town sentiment towards the student population.

Boss made comments, for which he later apologized to the Undergraduate Senate and Student Government Association, which referred to low voter turnout at on-campus polls. He said more students would have turned out to vote if kegs of beer were placed by the polls.

"They put us in the position of second class citizens," Tirrell said.

Yet the attendance of student representatives at the fall and spring sessions of Town Meeting this past year has not helped in garnering them the town's respect.

The nine student representatives had a 25 percent attendance rate for the eight nights of spring Town Meeting, and a one percent attendance rate for the eight nights of fall Town Meeting.

McCarthy, who had the best attendance records of any student representative for the spring Town Meeting, showed up six of the eight nights. He said he didn't show up to the fall sessions because he was in the middle of filling out law school applications, adding that the fall session was not important enough to students to show up for the remaining meetings.

"To me the garage is not a real front burner issue," McCarthey

Students show support of Tibetan "fast unto death"

BRIAN MCDERMOTT / COLLEGIAN

Karma Dolma, a UMass graduate student in education, and Tsewang Phuntsok of Hadley participate in yesterday's fasting protest in Amherst.

By Jason Trenkle
Collegian Staff

AMHERST — A Dawn-To-Dusk Fast was held yesterday on Amherst Commons in support and recognition of the Tibetan individuals who are suffering from hunger and abuse in a Chinese occupied Tibet.

Six Tibetans between the ages of 25 and 70 have been on a fast unto death in New Delhi, India, since March 10; thirty years after the Chinese repressed the Tibetan people. The fast has been undertaken because the demands of India have been ignored by the United Nations, the United States and by other countries for too long. The demands include the Tibetan right to self–determination and the need to address China's genocidal practices in Tibet.

In honor of these struggles, several Tibetan Student Associations from western Massachusetts and Students for a Free Tibet Chapters (one of the largest student organizations in the U.S.) helped organize a one–day fast on Amherst Commons in honor of the six individuals that are involved in the fast unto death in India.

Among those fasting at Amherst Commons was Dawa Gyaltsen, spokesperson of the Tibetan Students Association from the University of Massachusetts.

"The situation today is that the Tibetan culture is facing extinction. Tibetans are being reduced to a minority in their own country," Gyaltsen said.

The week of April 25 will be named Tibet Week in the five–college area, where lectures and discussions will be presented.

"The significance of the week is to demand the release, from Chinese captivity, of the Panchen Lama, who is the youngest and second most important Tibetan political prisoner in the world at 8–years–old," Gyaltsen said.

Lama, whose where abouts is still unknown, will experience his ninth birthday during Tibet Week.

Other presentations at UMass will include a video presentation on April 21 that will provide information on getting involved and becoming more aware of the aspects that need to be addressed relating to the repression of the Tibetan culture.

Jessica Collins, a member of the Tibetan Student Association from Smith College, was also fasting. Collins helped organize a party/concert to be held on Friday, April 24 at the Davis Center at Smith College.

"I think that we're privileged enough to have the opportunity to speak on behalf of those individuals that are suffering and don't have the opportunity to speak out for themselves," Collins said.

These are just a few of the Western Massachusetts efforts that have been organized to help those suffering in Tibet.

"I am constantly reminded everywhere I go of the Tibetan youth that are being brainwashed by the Chinese officials. The future of the world depends on the younger generation and if some action is not taken, the Tibet culture may face the threat of extinction," Tsering Dorgee of the Tibetan Association Chapter of Holyoke said.

Students interested in assisting the Students for a Free Tibet Chapter can call Leda at 585–6900.

weeks to underwrite the cost of running the campaign. Aside from lawn signs, buttons and platform flyers, cards also had to be printed with a removable sticker with Vecchio's name, including instructions on how to vote for a write-in candidate.

"Almost all the money is spent and it went into material that you see. The rest is budgeted for the day of the election," Vecchio said.

Fifty volunteers from Vecchio's campaign committee will be passing out stickers tomorrow at all eight polling places, including the one in Southwest Residential Area.

"When anyone goes to vote, volunteers will be very clearly recognizable with green stickers and cards," Vecchio said.

A "Get Out to Vote" campaign will also be taking place throughout the day outside Hampden Dining Commons in Southwest Residential Area. Music will be playing throughout the day and food will be served as an incentive to get registered voters at the University to vote.

"It's to serve as a reminder. I've been busy calling registered voters, and I think by now people should be very aware," Vecchio said.

Vecchio's goal is to get at least 200 students to vote using the Hampden polling place.

By staying in Amherst during spring break, Vecchio was able to go door knocking throughout town as well as participate in a candidates debate televised from Jones Library. The debate has been aired in Amherst 12 times and was attended by over 100 town residents.

"I think it came off really well. I would say that everyone was a little unclear about my candidacy until the debate. I think it's given me a lot of momentum. I've given them reason to take me seriously," Vecchio said.

Vecchio credits his strong volunteer base for the success of the campaign thus far. Unlike student run campaigns in the past, Vecchio has focused on Amherst residents as well as University students by door-knocking in town and in residence halls and by using a phone bank.

"When calling voters, I want to make sure people are clear where to vote. While I'm finishing up my campaign and trying to sway the undecided, I'm also just trying to get people out to vote," Vecchio said.

UM Pride Alliance hosts professor panel

By Dylan Larke
Collegian Staff

The Pride Alliance, University of Massachusetts' undergraduate gay, lesbian, bisexual and trangendered group, will hold a panel discussion tomorrow night about the coming out experiences of seven "Queer UMass Professors."

The discussion will be held in room 162 of the Campus Center at 7 p.m. and will be followed by a question-and- answer session. Panelists will discuss the positive and negative reactions they received from fellow departmental staff members and students.

"It should be interesting to see what the professors have to say about their experiences of being out at UMass," said Pride Alliance Steering Committee member and junior philosophy major Kate Geyer.

A diverse group of male and female professors, of all different sexual orientations, will be speaking from various departments. None of the speakers are from the same department. For example, a few of the professors are from the communication, anthropology and political science departments.

"We tried to get the most diverse group of professors to speak that we could find," Geyer said.

Pride Alliance Steering Committee members had little trouble finding out female professors to speak on the panel, but had difficulties finding out male professors to speak.

Geyer believes this is because "it is harder for gay men on campus than gay women to come out on campus."

According to several members of the Pride Alliance Steering Committee, there are only a limited amount of out gay, bisexual, or transgendered males on campus because men tend to receive more harassment than females based on sexual orientation.

"I am excited for Tuesday night's panel. We are expecting a good turnout," Geyer added.

said.

Tirrell agreed the garage was not an important issue to students.

Another reason Tirrell gave for low attendance by students was that Town Meeting normally met on Wednesdays, when student government holds its meetings.

"The undergraduate student senate is my priority," Tirrell said.

The timing of meetings and the content of some of the issues are visible reasons why students don't get involved, which is unfortunate, Town Meeting moderator Harrison Gregg said.

"Some of the issues we deal with are pretty local," Gregg said. "But issues like the parking garage affect them closely.

Brian Palmucci, a UMass student representative to Town Meeting, said he stopped attending the meetings, and hasn't decided when he'll get involved again.

Palmucci, a Delta Upsilon fraternity member, cites town contempt for fraternities as one reason why he made his decision not to attend.

Palmucci said he continues to hold onto his seat in case an important issue comes up.

"No one ran against me. The seat would remain vacant if I left," Palmucci said.

McCarthy said he still holds his seat because he plans to attend spring Town Meeting.

Claims by students that Town Meeting members discourage them from getting involved are a cop-out, Town Meeting member and former UMass journalism professor Howard Ziff said.

"Some old geezer frowned on you? — just go and do your duty," Ziff said. "Go in and fight."

Lewis Mainzer, also a Town Meeting member and former UMass professor, said students have not stood out as a separate force in the Town Meeting.

He said students should not concern themselves about whether residents are friendly towards them or not.

"Town Meeting is not like going to church where everyone gives you a hug, lots of folks feel unloved in life," Mainzer said.

Elections will be held on Tuesday from 12 –8 p.m. All students registered in Amherst can vote. Polling places in Southwest will be open for precincts 4A and 10A

Drug found to reduce breast cancer

PHILADELPHIA (AP) — A new study shows that a drug used for years to treat breast cancer patients also may prevent the disease from occurring. The Philadelphia Inquirer reported Sunday.

The National Cancer institute- a federal agency that coordinates the nation's cancer programs, said its six-year study was the first ever to show that a drug can reduce the incidence of breast cancer. The study showed that the drug tamoxifen cut cancer rates by nearly half among women who were considered at risk of getting the disease.

The institute recently mailed letters announcing the breakthrough to the 13,000 women in the United States and Canada who participated in the study, the newspaper reported.

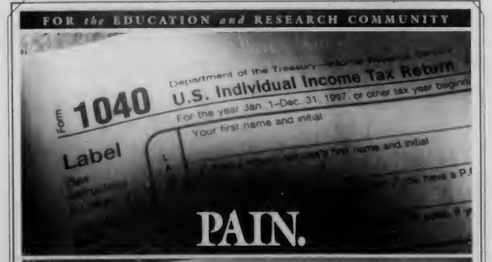
"This is now the first study in the world to show that a drug can reduce the incidence of breast cancer," the letter stated. The results of the study — one of the largest cancer prevention trials ever undertaken — are to be made public Wednesday.

Researchers would not discuss the results with the newspaper. "I'm just thrilled. Wow!" Patricia Lorah, 45, of Reading, told the Inquirer on Saturday after receiving her letter. "My mother and grandmother died of breast cancer. This is almost overwhelming."

Women at risk of getting the disease because of family history, precancerous breast lesions or age were randomly assigned to five years on either a placebo pill or tamoxifen.

The drug, made by Wilmington, Del.-based Zeneca Pharmaceuticals, is widely used to prevent the spread or return of breast cancer. According to the institute, the drug reduced the rate of expected breast cancers from 1 in 130 women to 1 in 256 during the study, the Inquirer reported.

However, tamoxifen also has been associated with increased risks for cancer in the uterine lining and for blood clots in the lungs. Those risks prompted The National Women's Health Network in Washington to criticize the study.



"If this turns out to be a good risk-benefit ratio for some women, that will be good news," said Cindy Pearson, executive director of the National Women's Health Network.

FOR the EDUCATION and RESEARCH COMMUNITY

For fast relief from the nagging ache of taxes, we recommend TIAA-CREF SRAs. SRAs are tax-deferred annuities that can help you build additional assets—money that can make the difference between living and living well in retirement.

Contributions to SRAs are conveniently deducted from your salary on a pretax basis. The result? More money invested. Fewer taxes now. And since investment earnings are tax-deferred until you receive them as income, the money you don't send to Washington can work even harder for you.

What else do SRAs offer? A full range of investment choices, a helpful loan feature, and the financial expertise of TIAA-CREF, the world's largest retirement system.*

into a downtown performance center for the arts.

Vecchio also hopes to prevent the extension of the University alcohol policy to affect off-campus students.

"The University has a role with off campus problems, but I don't believe this role should include imposing negative sanctions on students," Vecchio said.

Vecchio said that students who move off-campus should have the rights and protections of all other Amherst residents.

Vecchio, who as a member of SCERA was one of the student heads of the Student Union renovation project, also hopes to bring local business into the Campus Center/ Student Union complex.

"Students want better quality and retail, but it has to be done in a way sensitive to student business," Vecchio said. "I don't want a negative impact."

Margot Parrot

Margot Parrot has made a habit out of serving her community since she moved to Amherst in 1988. Having served on over ten different community and civic committees in the past ten years, Parrot feels she has experience dealing with many different constituencies.

She has been a Town Meeting member since 1989, and has served on the town Finance Committee — which makes recommendations on all financial articles presented to Town Meeting — for two and a half years.–

Parrot also served as the chair of the Public Arts Task Force from 1989–90, has been on the executive board of the Amherst branch of the NAACP since 1990, and is the former president of the Echo Hill South neighborhood Association.

Running under the slogan "open mind, open door," Parrot feels she would be an independent voice on the Select Board. She added that she would make Amherst residents — besides those few who currently dominate local politics — feel more included in town government.

"I believe people don't feel invited to be included in town affairs, I want to invite them," Parrot said.

If elected, Parrot would take further steps to end racism and classism in Amherst, and to promote the roles of neighborhoods in determining their own futures.

"Neighborhoods are the basic building blocks of society," Parrot said.

Parrot said she plans to hold meetings with the public to discuss the issues in their various neighborhoods.

In regard to problems between off-campus students and town residents, a great deal of cooperation is needed Parrot said.

But, Parrot said, she has found that it doesn't take much to get students to be considerate of neighbors.

"As soon as students know [permanent Amherst residents] live by them, they are respectful," Parrot said.

Parrot said the problems with off-campus parties were created when the University pushed drinking off-campus, but feels problems are made worse when students do not search out other forms of recreation.

"I don't feel drinking is the be all and end all of existence," Parrot said. "There needs to be non-drinking activities."

Parrot reports on Amherst political affairs for the Western New England News Service on the local television program "Amherst Edition," which appears on Amherst Cable Television (ACTV).

She received her Bachelors of Arts degree in Community Organization from UMass ('97), and is currently a law student at Western New England College.

Dolly Jolly

Although a stranger to politics, Dolly Jolly is no stranger to Amherst. She has lived here since 1967, raised a family here, and is going to UMass for her Bachelors of Fine Arts degree.

Much of Jolly's campaign centers on the concerns of local businesses, which she feels are in need of assistance.

"There's lots of competition in the local area, lots of businesses have left the center including hardware and grocery stores," Jolly said.

Jolly herself has strong ties to the local business community. She is married to Jerry Jolly who is the part owner of The Pub and Rafters Sports Bar.

Jolly wants to expand the local tax base in order to assist Amherst businesses and the Amherst economy. She hopes to accomplish this by working with the local colleges and by working to create research parks.

"The schools are wonderful resources, but they don't help out the town with providing services such as maintaining sidewalks," Jolly said.

She also supports the construction of a parking garage at Boltwood Walk to help downtown business.

She also wants to improve communications between residents, students, the school administration, the Select Board and Town Meeting. She said she brings lots of practical experience working with and talking to people.

"I'm a very good listener. I've worked in Amherst with diverse groups of people for a long time," Jolly said.

But improved communication alone is not the solution to the problems posed by off campus students to the residential community.

The University really needs to take responsibility for off- campus students and maybe by implementing the same standards in neighborhoods as in dorms, students will be held more accountable for their actions, Jolly said.

Regarding the warrant article which will go before town meeting for the town to take Hobart Lane by eminent domain, Jolly said this was not the solution.

"The town can't take every complex by eminent domain," Jolly said.

The most important thing is to ensure that everyone is safe, and to prevent spillover from parties into neighboring yards, Jolly said.

Bryan Harvey

Incumbent Select Board member Bryan Harvey said that, over the last six years, he has tried to move in a couple of directions to improve the quality of life in the Amherst community.

He has introduced community policing, a paramedics unit that services Amherst and neighboring towns — which he calls a big step for Amherst residents, and has generally tried to get the town government to work better.

"We really need to bring people together and get them to focus on the common goals of the community, such as renovate town hall, support economic development and broaden Amherst's tax base," Harvey said. "We need to keep the town hall vital and take some of the pressure off of homeowners."

Harvey said he is running for another term because there continues to be opportunities to improve town services and there are things he wants to see through that are not completed yet.

In the future, Harvey sees a need for more town resources, programs, and opportunities for kids.

"With the University and colleges, Amherst is very difficult for kids growing up here," Harvey said. "It's not like a normal town, it's like a theme park."

Harvey attended UMass and received his B.A. in Political Science in 1977, and his E.D.D. in Education in 1997. He also received an Masters of Public Administration from the Kennedy School of Government at Harvard University.

Harvey said the Town–Gown committees relationship, which is meant to improve relations between the town and the University, is doing well.

–"I don't see it as a confrontation, having lived on both sides for so long," Harvey said. "I think that getting folks together to understand what problems look like from the other side will help relations."

In regards to the extention of the university alcohol policy, to include students that live in off–campus housing, Harvey declined to give a comment.

Teri Hwei Ling Greeney

When Teri Hwei Ling Greeney lived in Taiwan, she never thought she could have a say in the way government operated. Now, as a resident of Amherst, she prides herself on being a civic–minded American citizen

"I realize now that we have a responsibility and a privilege [as American citizens] to be involved in policy making and the affairs of the town," Greeney said.

Greeney has participated in the local democratic process by serving as a Town Meeting representative, and most recently by serving as the chair of the "Vote No on the Parking Garage" coalition.

She also acts as the coordinator of the soup kitchen located in the dining room of the First Congregational Church in downtown Amherst.

As the coordinator for the soup kitchen, which is open on Saturdays and Sundays, she works with volunteers, recruits workers, and searches out financial donations. She also must find a way to feed 100 people on a budget of $50 a weekend.

"I pride myself on my efficiency," Greeney said.

Greeney is running under a platform stressing environmental responsibility and aiming to improve student—resident relations.

Even though Amherst prides itself on its recycling efforts, and the level of participation is high, it could be better, Greeney said. Apartment complexes and downtown businesses need to be involved in the recycling effort, Greeney said.

"I would like to promote it in a painless way, without regulations or any financial strain," Greeney said.

Greeney would also like to make public transportation more available, and to appear as a more viable alternative. She would also like to have a bike path available on the main streets in uptown Amherst.

"Since we have a traffic congestion issue, we need to make other travel options available to deter car use," Greeney said.

And although she chaired the Coalition to Vote No on the Parking Garage, Greeney said she is not opposed to a garage, but feels a master plan should be worked out before a garage is built.

Greeney also wants to get students involved in the town, and suggests that residents should get to know their student neighbors. Various residents of the McClellen Street neighborhood in which she lives hold a Sunday brunch every month, and flyers are sent out to students to ask them to participate.

Greeney also would like to set up host families for students, which would eat with and talk to students in order to further acquaint them with the local community. She set up a similar program for Japanese exchange students at Maryville College, in Maryville, Tenn.

Involvement in Columbia

With Washington's foreign policy attention fixated on President Clinton's trip to Africa and U.N. weapon inspections in Iraq, a dangerous situation in Columbia has been developing with barely a fleeting interest being shown on the part of the Clinton administration — at least publicly.

As a result, the United States risks being sucked into a Vietnam–style quagmire after quietly stepping up military and civilian involvement in the South American nation to counter increased instability caused by left–wing rebels and the never–ending war against drugs.

Marty Keane

Apparently, the harsh realities U.S. peacekeeping forces learned from missions in Bosnia and Rwanda have not registered in the head of President Clinton and his foreign policy team.

If Clinton is as serious as he claims to be about "getting on with the business of the country," he must ignore the brewing powderkeg in Columbia no longer.

So far this year, the U.S. military and counter–drug presence in Columbia has almost doubled to more than 200 officials. They are involved in counter–insurgency training, intelligence gathering and civilian spraying of drug crops.

In response, one of the two main guerrilla groups has threatened to target U.S. military advisers, claiming that they are conducting covert counter–insurgency operations.

American military officials deny they are significantly beefing up their presence, claiming the numbers fluctuate as personnel are rotated. They say no U.S. combat troops are stationed in Columbia and most personnel are involved in manning two radar stations that monitor drug–smuggling planes. Sound familiar? It should.

The Clinton administration has shied away from outright involvement in fighting the guerrillas, partly because of the human rights abuses committed by the Columbian military and its paramilitary allies. The focus of U.S. policy toward the country has been fighting the cocaine, heroin and marijuana trafficking coming into our ports. It should continue to be. Getting involved with government upheavals is not something the Pentagon is very good at, especially in Latin America.

"Getting involved with government upheavals is not something the Pentagon is not very good at, especially in Latin America."

U.S. involvement in the drug war has taken on more of a counter–insurgency role since the Columbian Army last month by guerrillas operating in the country's dense southern jungle, Washington is hotly debating increased aid to tackle the rebels. About 80 soldiers died in the attack and another 60 were taken prisoner by the guerrillas.

The Clinton administration is also urging Columbia to increase its own efforts to strengthen its ill–equipped armed forces. That was the message during a recent visit by General Charles Wilhelm, head of the Miami–based U.S. Southern Command, which is responsible for U.S. security in Latin America. However, shortly after Wilhelm's visit, the guerrilla commander of the Revolutionary Armed Forces of Columbia (FARC), who led last month's attack, warned America to stay away.

Fabian Ramirez, a FARC regional commander, said in a March 20 Times of London article "The claim that the United States is combatting drugs in Columbia is a sophism. All the military and economic aid it is giving to the army is to fight the guerrillas." He added, "Most (Columbian army) battalions have U.S. advisers, so it is clear that Columbian rage will explode at any moment, and the objective will be to defeat the Americans."

Analysts say it is time that Washington reviewed its policy in Columbia. Increased U.S. involvement could give the guerrillas more ideological ammunition, they say.

Clearly though, the Clinton administration needs to get its act together, and quickly. What exactly is going on down in the jungles of Columbia? For what purpose?

One only need look at case after case over history in which the United States gets involved and then slides down a slippery slope, from Vietnam to Bosnia. Is Columbia next? Let's hope not.

Care for HIV patients

The Supreme Court heard a case Monday that presented the argument that HIV should be viewed as a handicap, allowing infected patients protection under the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA).

The case was brought before the court by Sidney Abbott, who claimed discrimination after a dentist in Maine refused to fill her cavity in his office, because she carries the human immunodeficiency virus.

The dentist, Dr. Randon Bragdon, is not the bad guy here, however.

Bragdon, who had been outspoken on his views that special precautions be taken when treating HIV-infected patients, was sought out by Abbott because of their differing viewpoints. Abbott is part of a national movement that challenges health care providers who refuse to offer treatment to HIV and AIDS patients.

Second of all, Bragdon did not refuse to treat her completely, but requested that treatment take place in a hospital, where greater precautions could be taken.

Was it wrong for Bragdon to request that his health and safety be taken into consideration before treating Abbott? Of course not. Even if one views HIV as a physical disability, the law states that if a person poses a threat to the health of others, treatment can be denied.

"Bragdon, like any medical professional, has every right to refuse treatment to a patient who he deems as a possible threat to his health or safety."

Abbott argues that HIV patients should be considered disabled because they are unable to have children, due to the risk of transmitting the disease to a child. This, however, is an ethical decision with no bearing on the actual physical ability to have children at all.

Abbott also wants the courts to protect the rights of asymptomatic HIV patients, but the Americans with Disabilities Act only covers those with "a physical or mental impairment that substantially limits one or more major life activities."

If patients show no symptoms, then their life activities have not yet been affected enough to warrant protection under the law.

Abbott's argument is full of holes and it appears that she is not trying to gain protection for those with HIV, but is instead trying to punish those medical professionals who treat her differently because of it.

Bragdon, like any medical professional, has every right to refuse treatment to a patient who he deems as a possible threat to his health or safety. No law should ever be put in place that would require someone to risk their lives for the routine treatment of another.

"Jesus Christ Superstar" deserved coverage

To the editor:

I am a senior at UMASS and so I have been reading The Daily Collegian for almost four years. Time after time I have been amazed at the poor coverage of important issues around campus, the lack of relevance of most of the pieces on the editorial page, the misinformation printed in both articles and advertisements, and the general lack of support the Collegian gives to its fellow Registered Student Organizations (RSOs).

I understand the Collegian is a business as well as an RSO and must function as such. I understand that it is an extremely large organization and things are bound to be overlooked from time to time, such as the double printing of the Edward James Olmos preview. We are all students here. However, the Collegian seems to have forgotten that it is in fact a student organization, and the students should be its top priority.

The UMass Theatre Guild just finished producing "Jesus Christ Superstar" in Bowker Auditorium March 25-28. I was the producer for the show, and we gave the Collegian complementary tickets so that they could review it. Not only did we not get a review in the two days after we opened, we did not get a review at all. This is unacceptable. Over 50 UMass Students worked on this production, and our ticket sales were well over 2,000. The only coverage included in the Collegian were two photos. No preview. No review.

The Collegian needs to think about its role on this campus and the impact that it truly does have over the students of this University. However, I'm not sure that the Collegian is capable of looking at itself with objective eyes. For myself, I have come to deal with the fact that the Collegian is not good for much more than the crossword puzzle.

Propped doors not the problem

To the editor:

In her April 3 column, Emily Vacanti called on residents to stop propping doors open. She asks why anyone would ever do this. I have an answer. Like Vacanti, I live in the BCG cluster. Baker Hall has six exits, only one of which we are permitted to use. I do not believe that the University or people like Vacanti have the right to make me walk 100 extra feet or even two extra feet to get to my room when there is a convenient entrance available.

If some people are too lazy to lock their doors, that is their own problem. I always lock my door. It is ridiculous to assume that the only thieves are "strangers." Your neighbors are just as able to steal from you and they are more likely to know when you are not in your room. The whole argument is a fallacy, because outsiders can easily get into any residence hall by waiting for someone else to open the door. Locking doors does not keep criminals out. All it does is annoy residents who have busy lives.

Support Pesticide Disclosure Act

To the editor:

How many times have you rolled down a grassy hill, played soccer in a field, or had a picnic in the park? Chances are you've done these things since grade school. Did you know that you could have been endangering your health?

The problem is pesticides. They are sprayed almost everywhere: on school grounds, parks, golf courses — your parents might have used them on your own backyard. Almost everywhere you go, pesticides are right there with you.

Are you concerned and angered at the fact that pesticides are sprayed without your knowledge? You have a right to be upset, but you still don't have a right to know where and when pesticides are sprayed. Sound fair? I don't think so, and neither should you.

Pesticides have been linked to birth defects, cancer, hormone disruption and neurotoxicity. Children whose yards have been sprayed with pesticides are 400 percent more likely to have soft tissue cancers, according to MassPirg. The Poison Control Center also reports around 110,000 pesticide poisonings every year and 27 "accidental" deaths from pesticide exposure. And those are just the effects on humans. The outlook isn't any better for your dog or cat, for birds, or any other living things. And still we are denied the right to know when pesticides are sprayed. Our health and mortality are at risk. The government is responsible for denying us the right to know.

The Ways and Means Committee of the state Senate is currently considering a bill entitled the Pesticide Disclosure Act. By passing this bill, it is possible that the frequency of pesticide use will be reduced and the least toxic pesticides would be used. In addition, we will be provided with information regarding these pesticides and what we can to do protect ourselves.

In our area, Senator Stan Rosenberg is the man who must be convinced that this bill is a good things. We have to write to him (Senator Stan Rosenberg, State House, Boston, MA 02133) or call him (617–722–1455) and tell him that we are citizens who have the right to know when and where pesticides are sprayed.

The real "Big Dance"

His mere presence seems to suck the intelligence from my brain.

Vangoh's "Starry Night" hangs ominously on the sterile office wall — a cookie cutter decoration that blends in among the other famous reprints as a form of anti–art. Mounted on the wall with the hope of breathing life into mundane corporate America, it fails miserably. Like the thousands of offices across the country with the same posters of the same paintings, aesthetics are replaced by an army of cliches which seem to take away more atmosphere than they offer.

From across the table comes the question which echoes in my brain with the clarity of an adult's voice in a "Peanuts" cartoon, "Blah, blah, blah blah."

Chris Stamm

The silence of a ticking clock echoes in the background, sweat begins to form on the crest of my brow, and my response begins to take shape. However, all I can think is, "What does he want me to say?"

Am I on trial for a crime? Has time melted away like a Salvador Dali landscape?

I wish.

Instead, I sit "on trial" in my third job interview in four days, mind racing as I try to bring voice to the response the interviewer wants to hear.

"The man across the desk lobs a question your way and you scramble, at first not to offer your own answer, but to tell him what he wants to hear."

While most people thought "The Big Dance" ended when Kentucky downed Utah in the National Championship last month, for me and my seniors, the real big dance is just beginning. With graduation T–Minus eight weeks and counting the job crunch is on.

They say this is the best time of our lives. They say there is nothing but possibility ahead of us. They say this is the culmination of four years of hard work. What they didn't say was that the entire job interviewing process — even when planned meticulously using the deepest, darkest resources at the Mather Career Center — is one of the largest mind games ever created.

Fear not, for I have answers, or at least an enlightened look from the edge that most of you can relate to. Perhaps you've felt the same way I have. The man across the desk lobs a question your way and you scramble, at first not to offer your own answer, but to tell him what he wants to hear. The only way I see it, there are three types of interviews:

The "I'm here in the big chair hiding behind this Titanic– shaped desk, you're on the other side cramped into a tiny folding chair — impress me" interview. You can't tell this guy anything he doesn't already know. Whatever you have done was 10 times better, 10 times harder or 10 times more important when he was in college. Yes him to death, give him your best smile and hope things work out tomorrow.

Second, there's the "Hannibal Lechter" interview. Your interviewer reads off a script with the emotion of a CIA agent interrogating a serial killer. You only wonder if everything at the company is as rigid and antiseptic. The defense is simple: with a cold, calculated glance, stare blankly over the interviewer's head. Respond to his questions in a soft monotone pausing at infrequent intervals. When he asks why you've stopped, tell him you are waiting for the voices to subside.

Finally, the best and most reassuring of all, the good interview. You respond to each question without thinking and your answers are all money. At the close of the interview, $42,000 and a cushy benefits package are yours. You are so money and you know it.

Maybe you're like me and haven't had one of these yet. Look on the bright side. Once you "win" the interview game, you get a handful of fun benefits not found in the glossy "work for our company" folder. You get your own cubicle. You get five days of rush hour traffic. You get to learn the ins and outs of business shorthand like 401K and HMO. And best of all, as a cousin of mine repeatedly reminds me, from here on in Christmas is a three–day weekend.

Is this something you really want to win?

Our nation needs to wake up

With the new information on experimental vaccines and the development of treatments for the AIDS virus, the media is leading the public to believe that the worse of this epidemic is behind us. The commercials on AIDS awareness seem to have lessened in intensity and urgency. The public's concerns over being exposed to HIV have dramatically decreased.

To most of us, there is no real crisis concerning the contraction of this deadly virus. "Just use a condom to prevent it," is the oversimplified message we are consuming today. The rumors currently being generated on a rather wide scale is that the cure for AIDS has already been discovered. We have come to expect miracles from scientists, doctors and researchers, which will permit the plague of AIDS to be stricken from our memories. AIDS victims seem to be attended to, and attention on preventive programs are almost non–existent.

This is a Lariat staff editorial from The Lariat at Baylor University.

Okay, maybe every now and then, a celebrity will wear a barely conspicuous AIDS ribbon on an extravagant gown or suit to somehow prove their awareness, but how seriously do we take AIDS?

How many of us know the high–risk factor (AIDS) which is killing blacks more than any other race in the U.S.?

True, the breakthroughs in medical technology and therapy are allowing more people to live with AIDS than die from it. In fact, since the year 1996, the number of deaths from AIDS has declined for the very first time and continues to decline. New medicine can minimize the growth of the virus if found at an early stage. HIV transmission from a mother to her'growing fetus is preventable.

However, the number of blacks being infected with HIV, developing AIDS and dying from it continues to rise every year. For those of us who choose to remain oblivious, the truth about AIDS may be hitting closer to home than realized. The statistics are downright scary:

African–Americans account for over 40 percent of all AIDS cases in the U.S. today, but represent only 12 percent of the entire population. Black men are six times more likely to get infected with HIV than white men and three times more likely to die from it. Black women are 16 times more likely to get infected than white women and nine times more likely to die from AIDS. More black infants are infected with HIV than any other race.

Currently less than three percent of the National Institute of Health's research grants are awarded to African–American researchers. Significantly more whites are receiving standard drug therapy and more effective drug treatments for AIDS than are blacks.

In 1992, it was estimated that every hour, another African– American died of AIDS. As more young blacks are finding out that they are infected, their suicide rates are beginning to soar. As of 1996, AIDS has become the leading cause of death for Blacks under the age of 55, more than heart disease, cancer and homicide. By the year of 2005, experts predict that the typical description of an HIV/AIDS victim will be: a straight, black male. Is that enough urgency for you?

As I read all of those statistics to a friend, his response was, "damn, forget about epidemic, this sounds more like genocide!" A little extreme? Maybe, maybe not. While an entire nation is beginning to feel comfortable in classifying AIDS as a passing scare, its affect on the black community continues to grow more and more detrimental.

The spread of AIDS within the black community has nothing to do with ethnicity (as we all should know AIDS does not discriminate), but it has everything to do with the risky behavior of individuals and the general misconceptions about the disease. The reasons why more blacks are suffering from AIDS are deeply rooted in both systematic and cultural factors.

The elements contributing to the spread of AIDS include a lack of access to quality health care, social and economic depression, poor education and misinformation. These factors affect blacks more than any other group.

Most African–Americans infected with HIV/AIDS live in the poorest, urban neighborhoods where drug trafficking is heavy and education is poor. Proper information on risks spreads at a much slower pace within these communities. Poor blacks are likely to be ill–informed on the risks of AIDS, they are more likely to shun the use of protection (they simply can't afford it), to use drugs intravenously, and are more likely not to go to the doctor on a regular basis.

In these desperate times, most African–Americans do not have adequate health insurance or access to health services and support programs. Even when there are low–cost services, or public health available, people are usually treated at the indiscretion of staff members who are likely to turn away people with full blown AIDS, the homeless and homosexuals. Unfortunately, racial inequality does exist within the health system.

But the worse factor fueling the spread of AIDS within Black America is ignorance. Not only are poor, uneducated blacks misinformed, but according to recent studies and tests, everyone wants to put the blame on someone else and perhaps use that as a means of suppression. Middle class, upper class and college students are believing a lot of the myths around AIDS, thus they do not protect themselves. Many blacks are very distrustful of White America, their white health systems, their services, their schools and their media. My same friend who suggested genocide as reasoning, found it easy to believe that they've already found the cure for AIDS but it's classified, on the down–low and part of a huge elaborate conspiracy against all black Americans. Perhaps a little paranoid, but not without reason.

If you remember, the first universal image of an individual with AIDS was a Central African man. Since then the scapegoat for the spread of AIDS has claimed everything from Africans, to African monkeys (talk about hidden parallels), to Haitians. Everyone wants to put the blame on someone else and perhaps use that as means of suppression. And as an entire nation, we all were guilty of categorizing AIDS as a gay disease, and some of us probably still do.

To black people, the concept of homosexuality had never really been discussed openly until recently. Most straight blacks would label themselves as anti–gay and being a homosexual may mean fearing physical harassment and assault. Until recently, popular culture, music and film had almost always portrayed homophobic images and messages towards gays (the gay images nowadays are really not positive ones, just more comical). The support for gay AIDS victims in the black community is scarce, being that many of our few disease support programs are sponsored by churches who condemn the gay lifestyle.

Although the sexual risk behaviors are universal, more blacks are becoming sexually active at younger ages, and contracting more STDs, including AIDS, than any other race. But who's talking about our homophobia or our distrust for doctors or our high risk for STDs? AIDS is feeding on our cultural's reluctance and biases to discuss sexuality and due to our own ignorance masked by fear and intolerance.

Just look at the campus here at UMass. How many of your friends (not you of course) engage in high–risk behavior for sexually transmitted diseases? Not trying to scare y'all, but if you know about all of the diseases running around, especially AIDS, shouldn't you take extra precautions? Some of us seem to be picking our sexual partners by shutting our eyes and chanting eenie, meanie, minee, me. And if your excuse happens to be that you just didn't know, after reading this you can no longer claim ignorance.

This article may give you an opportunity to think for a moment. Take a minute to reevaluate your own lifestyle and read up on some facts about AIDS and disease, and in particular, its affects on Black America. No matter how tightly you shut your eyes, the spread of AIDS isn't going to naturally come to a halt, it's going to take the action of an entire nation.

What's love got to do with it in the meantime?

You know where you want to be, but you have no clue how to get there. You know exactly what you want in life, but what you want is no where in sight. Perhaps your vision is unclear, your purpose still undefined. On top of it all your relationships are failing. If these scenarios feel familiar, you are in the middle of the meantime.
